For new owner, Argos are all in the family

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a lot of ways, Sherwood Schwarz is like a throwback to the good ol' days of sports ownership. You remember the type, the self-made businessman, idiosyncratic, likes to run things himself.

A far cry from the days, not so long ago, when the Toronto Argonauts were controlled by a faceless corporation headquartered in Belgium. Or even from the time before that when the glamour trio of John Candy, Wayne Gretzky and Bruce McNall called the Argos' shots.

Unlike those ownership situations, Schwarz plans to be here for a long, long time. A native of New York City, Schwarz maintains that his commitment to Toronto is "ongoing. I expect the next person to run the franchise will be my grandson, who's 12 years old."

Schwarz wants to make clear he's no fly-by-nighter and that his commitment to Toronto is strong. With the season still three months away, he's already made Toronto his second home, spending two days a week here. His daughter, Carrie, plans to be married in the Royal Ontario Museum in mid April and Schwarz, who has numerous community affiliations in New York, hopes to create ties to the local Jewish community as well.

But right now, boosting the Argos' profile, drumming up interest and filling the seats at SkyDome are his top priorities.

For the life of him, he can't understand why there's so much negativity associated with the Argos. They're an institution in this town, more than 100 years old, he points out. They play exciting football and, with the changes he is bringing to the organization, SkyDome will be the place to be during the summer and autumn months.

Last week, the Argos unveiled their plans to fill the stands. The Argos will appeal to younger fans by offering tailgate parties prior to each game, complete with exciting young bands, he said.

Sherwood Schwarz

The team announced it is reducing ticket prices and, in perhaps its most innovative new promotion, the team will hold a draw at the end of the third quarter, announce the attendance and offer the winner one looney for every fan at the game. With the prospect of a $20,000, $30,000, $40,000 or $50,000 prize, "it'll create a buzz" around the Argos, Schwarz believes.

The Argos plan to heighten community interest in the team through player outreach programs to schools, minor league teams and charities. Michael "Pinball" Clemons and Paul Masotti – two very popular players – will be added to the team's front office. To build player loyalty, the team will also offer athletes the services of a career counsellor to help them plan for the transition from pro sports to life after football.

Meanwhile, Schwarz is busy trying to recruit broad corporate support for the team. "Once people realize they can get in on the ground floor and will get more than their money's worth, they'll climb on board," he believes.

Ever the optimist, Schwarz can't understand why people aren't ready to jump on the Argos bandwagon and why the new football management team (J.I. Albrecht, John Huard) has been so severely criticized in the media before the season even kicks off.

Schwarz believes the public and the media ought to give Huard and Albrecht the benefit of the doubt and let them do their jobs before rushing to judgment. "Why not wait until we play and see how we play?"

Schwarz is expecting the changes he's brought to the Argos will pay off in the first year, with the team immediately generating a profit.

"I don't take a negative approach. You don't go from a 300-square-foot apartment to ownership of a team by thinking negative," he said.

Schwarz, who was born in Manhattan's lower east side, played basketball in high school after a brief and unsuccessful stab at football. After the six-foot-three end experienced his first hit, he decided hoops was a safer sport.

Following his military service, Schwarz got into the life insurance business, turning it into a successful enterprise.

A longstanding New York Jets season ticket holder, he never conceived of owning his own sports team – especially considering the prohibitive costs involved. The Jets, he pointed out, sold for $650 million US.

His longtime friend, J.I. Albrecht, talked him into looking at the Argos. Schwarz flew up to Toronto, saw his first live CFL game and then met with league executives.

He acquired the team for "a fair price." He won't be more specific.

"I'd heard about the Argos. It's like, if you had the opportunity to buy the New York Giants, how can you turn it down. It's an institution.

"There are three hot buttons," he continued, "sports, entertainment, politics.

"Everybody wants to be involved... You can be involved in a play, a movie deal that turned out well. But they're only one-shot deals. There's no comparison between that and owning a sports franchise."

Schwarz boasts numerous community interests. He's headed a financing campaign for Temple Israel in Great Neck, Long Island. He's been involved with Camp Simcha, a camp for terminally ill Jewish children. He's on the board of the National Yiddish Book Centre in Amherst, N.Y. and he's served on the board of the Weizmann Institute of Science.

Schwarz plans to bring a little piece of Yiddishkeit to the Argos as well. "The Argos don't play on Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur" and the executive offices will be closed on those days as well, he said.

Chess prodigy became Canada's first Grand Master

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With the passing of Abe Yanofsky on March 5, Canada has lost its greatest chess player and Winnipeg has lost a man who gave much to the city in a political career that spanned 25 years. Yanofsky died of cancer at age 74.

Chess and civic politics were the two major pillars of his life.

Yanofsky earned the title of Grand Master in 1964 at an Olympiad in Tel Aviv. Other highlights of his chess career include bringing a Pan Am chess tournament to Winnipeg in 1974 and participating in an Olympiad in Haifa in 1976.

Yanofsky's political career began in 1961, when he was elected an alderman in West Kildonan, Winnipeg's northwest suburb at the time. He later became mayor of West Kildonan.

As mayor, he was a strong advocate of Unicity – the amalgamation of all of Winnipeg's municipal councils into one city-wide council – and served as a Winnipeg city councillor from 1971 until he stepped down in 1986. During that period, he also served as finance chair.

Last Laugh

NEW YORK — Following the recent "amutot" (charitable association) scandal, for which Israel's One Israel Party was fined $3.2 million, Prime Minister Ehud Barak and some of his cabinet colleagues have apparently signed up to be contestants on the hit U.S. TV show Who Wants to be A Millionaire on their next visit to the United States.

In a related story, Ehud and Nava Barak recently held a garage sale outside their Kochav Yair home. Some of the major items for sale included the Golan Heights, the Lebanese Security Zone, a few Jerusalem neighbourhoods, a few cabinet ministers and the Temple Mount, plus numerous expensive paperweights received from foreign leaders, unspecified French objects donated by President Ezer Weizman, and several Pokemon cards. Business was brisk. According to unconfirmed press reports, while Barak was willing to give away the Golan and Lebanon to "the right buyer, at the right price," he was unable to get anything more than vague guarantees of payment from a mysterious agent who only identified himself as "Damascus Dan."

PARIS, France — At this week's fall fashion shows, the hottest designs highlighted Spirituality, filled with head coverings, fringes, shawls, one-sleeve jackets and, most interestingly, small leather boxes meant to be strapped to forearms and foreheads. Designer Ralph Lauren (aka Raphael Livshitz) was quoted as saying "This is a radically new, totally original approach to fashion accessories that are now incorporated into the main garment, and which emphasize personal spirituality that a person can put on and take off as easily as he or she changes clothes."

LONDON, England — Maverick Rabbi Shmueli Boteach, jet-setting author of the best-selling Kosher Sex, has announced he plans to write several other how-to books dealing with common recreational pursuits. The series, some of which are to be co-authored with American Martha Stewart, will include such titles as Kosher Drinking, Kosher Lawn & Garden Maintenance, Kosher Indoor & Outdoor Sports, Kosher Television Watching, Kosher Hunting & Fishing, Kosher Car Repair, Kosher Gambling, Kosher Gossiping and Kosher Computing.

CHICAGO — TaeBo inventor Billy Blankstein released Shokkelrobics, his latest workout video, to capitalize on the exercise craze that is already sweeping the nation's health clubs. Blankstein was quoted as saying that "Shokkelrobics combines the rhythmic intensity of davening with more traditional exercise, which is more gentle than boxing, but definitely more, uh, spiritual."

For those who want an even more extreme excrcise program, he also released ShulKiddushBo, which involves extensive sharp elbow work and rapid forearm action, combined with quick eating for efficient caloric consumption.

TEL AVIV — Plans are quickly being finalized for Pope John Paul II's historic visit to Israel this month. The 79-year old Pope has apparently expressed an interest in meeting Israeli teenagers. His itinerary now includes a visit to an undisclosed nightclub, hacking into the Vatican archives on the Net, and even a bit of time at the beach.

TORONTO — This year's KosherFest trade show featured a record number of new products and exhibitors. The Most Original Product Award was given to Shmuel Grepsman of Lakewood, N.J., for his Cholent Pops. Grepsman, who was disappointed with the poor response to his Herring-flavoured chewing gum last year, was elated with the award, but would rather have had some interested buyers for his cholent-flavoured popsicles. The "cool way to enjoy cholent any time, any place," he said, comes in three varieties – chicken, beef and vegetarian. Grepsman promised, to the organizers' horror, to be back next year, with even more innovative new product ideas.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I have a big problem. I'm in Grade 8 this year, and I have to decide which high school to go to next year. My choices are a Jewish school or the gifted program at another school. I have been putting off this decision for as long as I can, but lately my parents have been pressuring me to make a decision. They say they will support whichever decision I make, but I have to be the one to make the decision. I will have friends at both schools.

I feel that if I go to the gifted program, I will really develop intellectually; however, I also don't want to abandon my Jewish studies. I am really in a bind right now, and I don't know what to do. Please help me.

Undecided about High School

Dear Undecided About High School,

This is a difficult decision that many Grade 8 students have to make. If you are really pulled equally in both directions, then it is necessary to take certain steps to help you decide.

Make a list of pros and cons for both schools. Be as critical and as honest as you can. During this process, it might be helpful to speak to graduates or people attending both the high schools. These people will give you different insights into the different programs at the respective schools and will personally tell you how they feel about their school in general. This will help you understand more about the school from people who have personally experienced it.

Hopefully this will help you make your decision; however, if you still do not know where to go, speak to your parents about it. They have already told you that they will support you completely wherever you decide to go, so it cannot hurt to ask for their advice.

You know there are special and unique things about both schools. We realize that this makes the decision harder, but what it comes down to is that you have to follow what is in your heart. We are confident in the decision you will make. Have confidence in yourself and that you know what will be best for you. Good luck.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto

The Pope places a note in the Western Wall. The visit to the Temple Mount area on Sunday was the Pope's last official act before he left for Ben Gurion airport and the El Al aircraft that returned him to Rome.

Pope's visit ends at Kotel

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Pope John Paul II prayed at Judaism's holiest site as he concluded a week-long pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

When he visited the Western Wall last Sunday, the Pope rested his hands against the stones and prayed.

Reflecting a Jewish tradition, he placed a note in the Wall expressing sorrow over Jewish suffering at Christian hands over the centuries. After placing it there, he made the sign of the cross.

'The Wall touched him'

"We are deeply saddened by the behaviour of those who, in the course of history, have caused these children of yours to suffer and, asking your forgiveness, we wish to commit ourselves to genuine brotherhood with the People of the Covenant," said the Pope's typed, signed note.

Israeli cabinet minister Rabbi Michael Melchior, who welcomed the Pope at the Western Wall, said the Pope's visit there reflected the Roman Catholic Church's desire to end the era of "hatred, humiliation and persecution of the Jewish people."

Rabbi Melchior pledged that Israel would seek to keep Jerusalem out of the political fray.

"We commit ourselves to end the manipulation of the sanctity of Jerusalem for political gain. Jerusalem must reject hatred, struggle and bloodshed, and be again the city of peace and a source of holiness," Rabbi Melchior said.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Museum Welcomed

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress has welcomed the announcement by Heritage Minister Sheila Copps that the government will spend $58 million for a Canadian War Museum. With a new war museum now on surer footing, CJC says Ottawa should turn its attention to fulfilling its commitment to establish a museum dedicated to the Holocaust.

JWIC Slams Budget

TORONTO — While garnering praise in established Jewish fund-raising circles for having given charities tax breaks, the recent federal budget "squandered valuable resources which must be invested in children and their families," according to Paula Mittleman, president of Jewish Women International of Canada. She called on Ottawa to establish a target date for reducing poverty among the 1.4 million poor children and their families in Canada.

ISRAEL

Christian Centre

JERUSALEM — The Hebrew University has established what is believed to be the first Christian study centre at an Israeli university. Research at the Centre for the Study of Christianity, established with a grant from a Christian family from Belgium, will emphasize the role of Christianity in the Holy Land and the historic relationship between Christianity and Judaism.

Japanese Arrested

JERUSALEM — Israeli media reported last week that Japan has arrested four members of a terrorist group who took part in a 1972 attack at Lod airport that killed 24 people. The four members of the Japanese Red Army were deported from Lebanon.

Algeria Interested?

JERUSALEM — Algeria's president is reportedly interested in purchasing defence equipment from Israel, according to the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot. The paper said the Algerians made contact with a private company previously headed by Danny Yatom, who left the firm nearly a year ago to become Prime Minister Ehud Barak's chief security and political adviser.

WORLD

Trial Stops

LONDON — The trial of an aging doctor accused in the deaths of nine children in a Nazi-run euthanasia facility has been suspended indefinitely after a psychiatrist testified the defendant was suffering from dementia. The trial of Heinrich Gross, 84, closed about half an hour after it began, and it appeared unlikely that proceedings will resume.

Shul Reopens

KIEV — The Great Synagogue of Kiev is slated to reopen this week after years of reconstruction financed by local Jewish leaders. Built in 1898, the synagogue in the Ukrainian capital was confiscated by the Soviets in 1926. Under the Nazi occupation, it was used as a stable. After World War II, it was used as a puppet theatre before being returned to the community.

Talks Could End

BERLIN — Germany's chief negotiator said in talks aimed at distributing a $5.2 German compensation fund to Holocaust-era slave labourers that he is hopeful a final plan will be worked out this week. Otto Lambsdorff's comments came before the talks were slated to resume in Berlin.

Looted Painting

NEW YORK — The Metropolitan Museum of Art has admitted that it has a Nazi-looted painting in its collection. Museum officials said the Nazis likely looted Guardroom With the Deliverance of Saint Peter by the 17th-century Flemish painter David Teniers the Younger, in Vienna in 1938.

Balkan Jews Organize

SKOPJE, Macedonia — Jews from half a dozen Balkan states met here this month to discuss a possible umbrella group. "There are very few Jews in the Balkans," said Viktor Mizrachi, the president of the 200-member Jewish community of Macedonia. "Each can love his own country, but we have to form a fist or we will disappear."

Rabbi Heads Group

PARIS — A European rabbinical group elected France's chief rabbi as its president, marking the first time a non-British rabbi has headed the group. The Conference of European Rabbis' election of French Chief Rabbi Yosef Sitruck is also believed to mark the first time the group has had a Sephardi rabbi as its leader.

Much Ado About Gornisht

OTTAWA (JTA) — The recent use of Yiddish in the House of Commons can only be described as mishugah.

Reform party MP Lee Morrison stated earlier this month that a government minister was mishandling her responsibilities with a great deal of chutzpah.

Although that Yiddish word has slipped into common parlance in recent decades, Morrison mispronounced it.

Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray immediately jumped to his feet and offered additional Yiddish words to describe Morrison's question.

"Mr. Speaker," Gray said, "if the honorable member wants to ask a sensible question, I will give him two other words which more accurately describe his question and the questions of the Reform party.

"His questions are all gornisht [nothing] and absolute narishkeit [foolishness]."

Although it is doubtful they understood his Yiddish phrases, some of Gray's Liberal colleagues shouted "Hear, hear" in mirthful agreement.

"Order, please," said the Speaker. "I have no way of knowing whether or not those words are parliamentary."

2 bakeries closed in health blitz

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two kosher bakeries were closed earlier this month by the department of public health as part of the highly publicized blitz on food establishments in the city of Toronto.

Isaac's Bakery on Bathurst Street was ordered closed on Friday, March 17, while Carmel Bakery was closed three days later on the day before Purim. Both were found to have mouse infestations and unsanitary conditions.

Isaac's has since reopened. As of the time of this writing, Carmel remains closed.

The closures raised questions by many in the community about the role of the Kashruth Council (COR) in maintaining the cleanliness of facilities under its supervision.

In an interview with The CJN, Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of COR, said that the organization operates under the assumption that before an establishment opens, it has fulfilled all public health requirements, and that it is inspected on a regular basis to ensure compliance with the requirements.

"Where has the public health department been all this time?" he demanded. "I'm appalled."

According to COR, kashruth inspection visits are conducted with varying frequency, depending on several factors, including the kind of premises it is, and what foods are involved. When the COR mashgichim inspect kosher premises, they are looking mainly for proper ingredients and procedures.

"They are not trained as health inspectors – they are rabbis," Rabbi Levin said. "Of course, if they see something that is not acceptable, like cockroaches or mice or something, they are expected to bring it to the attention of the owners."

This may have to change, according to Rabbi Levin, suggesting that "we may have to look at special training [in these matters]."

The heart of the city

Uri Amedi is an imposing man. His eyes – large, warm brown orbs – immediately pin you against the wall of your own conscience and convey the certainty that he has seen a great deal in his life; his calm, quiet comportment conveys the certainty that he has understood a great deal of what he has seen; and his thoughtful but forthright conversation conveys the equal certainty that he draws upon this understanding with insight and wisdom.

Amedi was born in Jerusalem almost 50 years ago. It is the place he knows best on earth. It is the place he loves best on earth; and it the place he is trying to make the best on earth.

He is the manager of the Nachla'ot Community Centre in an inner city Jerusalem development called Lev Ha'ir, which literally means inner city or the heart of the city.

Late last month, he met with a handful of foreign journalists who were in Jerusalem to attend the Eighth International Conference of the Jewish Media. The journalists were on a field trip to Lev Ha'ir as part of the conference.

To understand the story of Lev Ha'ir, one must know where it is, what it once was and what it is today.

The anchor of the Lev Ha'ir community is Machane Yehuda, the exotic, colourful, noisy, outdoor, covered market whose thoroughfares and alleyways fill to overflowing with shoppers and onlookers before Shabbat and holidays.

But the community comprises much more than the market. It is a dense mix of diverse peoples, encompassing the widest of societal cross-sections: haredi and secular, Ashkenazi and Sephardi, new immigrants and Jerusalemites-for-generations; commercial and residential; poor and middle class.

It is one of the oldest neighbourhoods in "new" Jerusalem, founded through the generosity of Moses Montefiore in the late 19th century. Two of the sub-neighbourhoods within Lev Ha'ir today even bear his name: Mazkeret Moshe and Ohel Moshe, originally Ashkenazi and Sephardi streets respectively. If one looks carefully at the markings and the stonework throughout the neighbourhood one will see 16 distinct gates. For those readers familiar with the geography of Jerusalem, it is bounded by Jaffa Street in the north, Bezalel Street in the south; the Sacher Garden in the west and the King George area in the east.

From the editor's desk

In the early 1970s, the area was a social and urban blight in the city. Even though abandoned by large numbers of residents for cleaner, more spacious premises in the expanding outer skirts of the city, the area was cramped and crowded with more than 17,000 residents.

Neglected by the municipality, the inner city became a hangout by day for the idle, and a haven by night for dangerous criminals and desperate drug addicts.

A decade later, fed up with the crime, the neglect, the squalor, the lack of opportunity and the distressing pessimism of the area, Uri Amedi decided to act. He approached the merchants of Machane Yehuda with the idea that to make things better for everyone, they would have to show leadership, organize and improve the neighbourhood.

Some two years after that, in 1988, the seed of social action that was planted and germinated by Amedi caught the imagination of the Keren Hayesod and then the Jewish Agency for Israel. Within the framework of Project Renewal, they resolved to help rebuild the social infrastructure of the inner city neighbourhood.

Today, the area is one of the most sought after in the city, transformed into a healthy, thriving dynamic place by dint of grassroots initiative, courageous local commitment, generous but careful philanthropy and effective planning and implementation.

The Nachla'ot Community Centre which Amedi manages, provides a number of vital services to the residents of the neighbourhood: a learning centre for specialized extra-curricular, private, educational help to about 50 elementary students; a wide variety of services for the elderly; cultural and recreational activities for all local residents and activities for people with special needs.

Outside the centre there are separate premises for: a youth sports club, operating out of a converted bomb shelter; an early childhood centre; and a heritage centre. There is also the Sacher Gardens.

More than 6,000 people live in the area alongside 1,000 commercial enterprises.

"The level of crime has significantly dropped in the last 10 years," Amedi tells us. "More important," he says, "everyone meets here. As they meet, they talk to each other and as they talk they get to know each other and try to resolve problems together, but not necessarily to do away with their differences.

"There are 54 synagogues in the neighbourhood. The haredi community is unlike its counterpart in other parts of the city in that it is part of the larger whole. It shares in the burdens of the entire neighbourhood."

Just before our visit ended, we met a six-person panel representative of the neighbourhood. Its composition was an eloquent rallying cry for the hope that we all harbour: an Israeli-born merchant from Machane Yehuda, a haredi woman social worker, an Arab social worker, a young immigrant from Miami, a senior resident originally from Yugoslavia and the spokesperson, originally from Uruguay.

Of course, the area, like all areas everywhere, still has its problems. But in many respects it is a microcosm of the very best in urban living; of mutual respect and tolerance; and of the possibility that, standing side by side in common cause, we can find solutions.

Community leader described as 'everybody's friend'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a high-level volunteer in over a dozen organizations, Ralph Snow was one of Toronto's most active Jewish community leaders. He died of cancer last week at his home. He was 78.

Obituary

A native of Trzemysl, Poland, Snow (né Raphael Schneebaum) was the son of a lawyer. His own law studies were cut short by World War II, during which he was incarcerated at several concentration camps. His father had died when Snow was a teenager. Other family members did not survive the Holocaust.

"We never concentrated on the past," Snow's longtime friend and fellow survivor Mike Rosenberg told The CJN. "We concentrated more on the present and what we could do to make life better for our children and for klal Yisrael."

Rosenberg, who knew Snow for 40 years, worked with him for several groups including B'nai Brith Canada, Israel Bonds, and the societies (landsmanshaften) division of UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto (which they co-chaired). Recently they were among the founding members of Jewish Holocaust Survivors in Canada.

"At that time," recalled Rosenberg, "he was already not well, but he felt he had something to contribute."

Rosenberg remembers his friend as "a unique individual" for his commitment to family, friends and community. "I did not lose a friend. I lost a brother," he said tearfully.

Snow rebuilt his life after the war. He met his wife Isabella in Budapest, and they immigrated to Toronto in 1951 after initial plans to make aliyah did not work out.

He began to work in Toronto as a milkman for Alliance Dairy, and worked his way up to supervisor before becoming a partner in the business.

When Alliance was sold to Sealtest, Snow stayed on for a year before entering the restaurant/tavern business, first in Whitby and then in Toronto as co-owner of the Nag's Head.

Snow loved learning, reading, travel and the arts, said his son-in-law Irv Feferman, in his eulogy at Snow's funeral last Friday at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. "He was a versatile man [who] really taught me a lot about life."

Ralph Snow

When Snow's children were young, he would take them to the opera and the symphony, but also to hockey games, Feferman said. In later years, he became a role model and friend to his grandchildren, he added.

A Beth Emeth member for 35 years, Snow served as president for two years. He was a trusted confidant of Rabbi Joseph Kelman, the congregation's rabbi emeritus, who officiated at the funeral.

Rabbis need, in a congregation, "a sound, sensitive, intelligent ear and mind that you can speak to confidentially, someone you can trust," Rabbi Kelman said.

"For many years Ralph was my voice of reason, at times to encourage me, at other times to tell me to hold back…For me personally it's a great loss."

Lawrence Hart, national president of B'nai Brith Canada, paid tribute to Snow, who served as president in the late 1980s, in a news release. "I was constantly in awe of his energy, his tremendous insight and his belief in B'nai Brith Canada and the entire Jewish community," said Hart, who worked closely with Snow.

Snow was "an outstanding communal leader, totally committed to the welfare of the Jewish people," added Frank Dimant, the organization's executive vice-president.

A UJA FEDERATION news release described Snow as a "tireless" campaigner. He was "a gentle man who symbolized tzedakah," said Alan Sandler, UJA FEDERATION vice-president.

Snow was a "ball of fire" with the energy of a 20-year-old, said Toby Feldberg, who succeeded him as president of Beit Halochem Canada two years ago. Much of his work was behind the scenes, she added.

As well as serving as president of Beit Halochem Canada, Snow chaired the Jewish chapel campaign at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre and was active in Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, the Pardes Shalom Cemetery board, the Jewish National Fund, the Toronto Jewish Music Society, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the Reena Foundation, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), among others.

Igor Korenzvit, who knew Snow as a founding member of the JRCC's board of governors, said Snow did not lend just his name, but also his time and support.

"Everybody thought they were his friend – and they were," Korenzvit said.

"He had more friends in this community than anybody else."

Snow leaves Isabella, his wife of 54 years, their daughter Margot Feferman and her husband Irv, son Alan of Seattle, and three grandchildren.

Driman to oversee Holocaust Centre expansion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bookcases behind overfilled bookcases line the back wall of a modest multi-purpose room at the entrance to the offices of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre (HEMC).

This summer, as part of an expansion that's been in the works for a year, the room will be renovated as a lounge and the books will be relocated to the museum's new resource centre. The lounge will be named for the late Robert Engel, a long-time Holocaust educator and community volunteer who died in December.

Howard Driman

Howard Driman, who recently took over from Michael Herman as chair of the 15-year-old centre, will oversee the expansion.

A 900-square-foot resource centre, to be located in the Albert Latner Library across the hall from the HEMC in the Lipa Green Building, will have books, tapes and new computers.

The idea, said Driman, is "for this to be the main repository for Holocaust information in the city, so that anybody doing research can come here and find whatever they need. We want to try and have as wide a selection of Holocaust materials as possible."

The resource centre is being funded in part by Frank Ekstein (through UJA FEDERATION, which funds the HEMC's day-to-day operations) in honour of his wife Anita, a survivor and active volunteer.

The museum will operate as usual during the renovations. Visitors tour the facility with a volunteer docent and are addressed by a survivor. About 60 survivors share their stories at the museum and at schools.

Each year, the HEMC hosts at least 25,000 schoolchildren of all religious backgrounds, said Driman, a Toronto accountant who became involved about seven years ago. He called the HEMC to volunteer his services after visiting the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

"I suppose that was the spark that motivated me," said Driman, who has served on the Yom HaShoah committee, as a March of the Living chaperone and as a three-time chair of Holocaust Education Week.

To the best of his knowledge, none of his relatives were murdered – the word he prefers to lost or perished – in the Holocaust. A native of Durban, South Africa who immigrated here in 1978, Driman is the grandson of Russian and English (originally Polish) immigrants.

At one time, the vast majority of Holocaust Education Week committee members were survivors or children of survivors, he noted. That is no longer the case, a change Driman finds very gratifying.

Other initiatives in which he will be involved over his three-year term as chair include an international conference for child survivors and hidden children to be held here in 2002, outreach to the Rwandan community who are learning how Holocaust survivors rebuilt their lives, and a program called Continuing Voices, which pairs young people with survivor speakers, so that the young people can carry on the testimony.

Special garbage pick-up set for erev Passover

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The City of Toronto has agreed to a one-time pilot project to collect chametz from Jewish homes on the day of erev Passover.

Through the efforts of Coun. Anne Johnston, the city's works and emergency department will provide special garbage pick-ups on Wednesday, April 19, so that Jewish homes can be completely rid of their chametz before Passover.

The pick-ups will take place between 9 and 10:30 a.m. Garbage trucks will be waiting in the parking lots of the following locations:

Torah Emeth Jewish Centre, 1 Viewmount Ave.; Yeshiva Yesodei Hatorah, 77 Glen Rush Rd.; Agudath Israel of Toronto, 129 McGillivray Ave.; Clanton Park Synagogue, 11 Lowesmoor Ave.; and B'nai Torah Congregation, 465 Patricia Ave.

The service was instituted following queries by Johnston about the special needs of the Orthodox community in the Bathurst-Lawrence area. She consulted with one of her constituents, Anthony Heller, a member of the Boat Shul on Bathurst Street.

In a meeting with Toronto's director of solid waste collections, Heller pointed out that Jewish law dictates that all bread and related products must be removed from Jewish homes as well as their properties before sunset on the day before Passover begins.

Normally, garbage collection in the area is Thursdays. It used to be twice a week prior to the amalgamation of the old City of Toronto and surrounding municipalities.

The city says the special pick-up will be reviewed in the future, with consideration given to when Passover falls.

An historic visit

Though we barely notice, the wheel of history turns inexorably, leaving its furrowed impression in the scarred, dark earth of time, sometimes along a path to a better place; sometimes, alas, along a path toward night and fog.

Three and a half decades ago, the Bishop of Rome, Pope Paul VI visited Israel by the back door, as it were, for only the briefest flicker of time. He could not even bring himself to pronounce the word Israel. Nor did he address the Jewish people, or speak to the prime minister or to any Jewish religious leaders.

Last week, the Bishop of Rome, John Paul II, inclined his head toward the stones of the Western Wall and placed the words of his plea for forgiveness from the people of Israel between the seams of the ancient stones. It was the last day of an exhausting six-day visit to Israel in which the Pope met with the Jewish state's political and religious leaders and was protected everywhere he went by its best young soldiers.

Earlier in the week at Yad Vashem, the Pope spent what may have been the most emotional and dramatic moments of his tour in Israel. He met there with a childhood friend, with someone whose life he had saved and with a group of survivors from his hometown. "In this place of solemn remembrance," the Pope intoned, "I fervently pray that our sorrow for the tragedy which the Jewish people suffered in the 20th century will lead to a new relationship between Christians and Jews." All who were there, including the prime minister of Israel, were visibly moved by the painful poignance of the moment.

Some people dispute the true purpose and substantive impact of the Pope's measured, deliberate behaviour in Israel. After all, they validly point out, "the tragedy" of which he spoke at Yad Vashem would have been reduced if not even possibly averted, had the Catholic Church formally condemned the perpetrators of the tragedy. Moreover, during his tour of Israel, the same people remind us, the Pope extended his hand toward the Palestinians as well.

It is indeed true that major issues still exist between Judaism and Roman Catholicism, between the Jewish people and the Catholic Church, and between Israel and the Catholic Church. But it is also true that the Pope's six-day visit was indeed historic, unimaginable just 3½ decades ago.

At the Western Wall, Judaism's most cherished spot on earth and indisputably, the spot most widely recognized around the world as the embodiment of the Jewish people's sovereign return to modern history, the leader of the Roman Catholic Church stood, not in defiance of Jewish sensibilities but in deference to them.

We hope and pray that history's wheel is indeed turning along a path to a better place.

More kudos for Birthright Israel

Last fall as we sat in shul listening to our rabbi speak from the pulpit, it was the first time I heard about Birthright Israel. I thought it was a wonderful idea, but since my children had been to Israel several times, including one having had his bar mitzvah at the Wall and two of them having studied for one year at the Hebrew University, I didn't give it any more thought.

In November, my daughter called me all excited. She was asked to be one of the group tour guides. Her only concern was that her exams were set for the 10 days following her return from Israel. How would it affect her marks? We encouraged her to go since she is a conscientious student. We felt that her experiences in Israel would stay with her long after anything she studied for that particular set of exams.

Nervously she left for Israel. She returned, having participated in a most unusual opportunity. She did well in her exams, but most importantly, she has wonderful memories and made many new friends.

The program launched by Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt to bring young Jews from the Diaspora to Israel is a fantastic concept. I agree with a previous letter-writer that this program has allowed young people to develop a new enthusiasm for Judaism, has encouraged them to become more involved in their Jewish community and will stay with them long into the future as they participate in many different ways, contributing to the Jewish community and to Israel.

Bronfman and Steinhardt must be recognized for more than assisting a thousand young unaffiliated Jews to get a "free ride" to Israel.

The game proceeded in Israel too

With regard to Gidi Koren's latest Hebrew article (CJN, March 16) citing the lack of sensitivity of Ontarians who ignored the death of a bystander and went on with the hockey game, Koren went on to contrast this behaviour with the land where he was born, where such a thing "could not possibly happen."

But since arrogance, I'm sure he'll agree, is a universal trait, I must remind him that when the bridge collapsed at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, the opening ceremony went on in spite of the deaths and injuries of many more. Or perhaps he wishes, as we all do, to forget that chapter in our own Israel and imagine that we would be better in similar circumstances.

Purim part of Iranian history

In your March 16 issue you feature an article about Purim in Iran. Your contributor, Shanaz Keypour, is mistaken in stating that there is no trace of the Purim story in ancient Iranian history. I was invited to the home of a recent Iranian immigrant to the United States and his wife, who were living in Miami, Fla.

While sitting in their living room waiting for dinner to be served, my wife noticed a massive illustrated volume on the coffee table. We leafed through the book, which was an illustrated work of Persian history. Much to our surprise, we came upon a chapter titled Queen Esther. It was prefaced by a gorgeous oil painting of Esther before she became the chosen of King Achashverosh. The story told the events of the time, mentioning all the names that we are familiar with from our Megillah.

Needless to say, we really enjoyed our dinner with the young Iranian and his wife, knowing that an important part of Jewish history was also part of Persian/Iranian history.

Book on mother-child bond

My mother died when I was six, leaving me with deep regrets and empty places. I wish I had a clear recollection of her. It hurts that I cannot remember the sound of her voice, the shape of her hands, the ring of her laugh, the strength of her arms.

I am compiling an anthology of combined voices trying to make sense of the mystery of the mother-child bond. I hope to publish this collection, which will be a gift to me and to those who wonder in their quietest moments, "What is it like to have a mother?"

Machal not just from Toronto

This letter is further to Lou Vandelman's letter of Feb. 17 on the subject of Machal (Israel's War of Independence) veterans. We are veterans of Jewish origin who fought for Canada in World War II. In Toronto, we are the General Wingate Branch #256 of the Royal Canadian Legion. Across Canada, we are the Maccabee Branch #343 in Hamilton; the Balfour Branch #362 in Windsor; the Gen. Monash Branch #115 in Winnipeg; the Shalom Branch #178 in Vancouver; and the Brig.-Gen. Frederic Kitsch Branch #97 in Montreal.

All of these are patriotic branches, not lodges or outposts, of the Royal Canadian Legion. Since the majority of our living Canadian Jewish war veterans are members of these branches, it may be reasonably assumed that most, though by no means all, of the Machal could be found therein.

Perspectives

'Pray for the peace of Jerusalem'

The following are excerpts from the text of Prime Minister Ehud Barak's speech last week at Yad Vashem, for the visit by Pope John Paul II:

In the name of the Jewish people, in the name of the State of Israel and in the name of all the citizens of Israel – Christians, Muslims, Druze and Jews – I welcome you with a greeting of friendship, brotherhood and peace, in Jerusalem, the capital of Israel, the eternal city and the city of peace…

Your Holiness, we meet today in this sanctuary of memory for the Jewish people and for all humanity. Yad Vashem – literally, a place and a name – for the six million brothers and sisters, for the 1.5 million children, victims of the barbarian evil of Nazism.

When the darkness of Nazism descended, and my people were led from all over Christian Europe to the crematoria and the gas chambers, it seemed that no longer could one place any hope in God or man; that in the words of the prophet Joel: "The sun and the moon darkened and the stars withdrew their luster."

And the silence was not only from the heavens. During that time, here in the Land of Israel, the poet Natan Alterman wrote these searing, tormented words: "As the children cried underneath the gallows, the wrath of the world we did not hear."

Your Holiness, from the depths of that "long night of the Shoah," as you called it, we saw the flickers of light, shining like beacons against the utter blackness around them. They were the righteous gentiles, mostly children of your faith, who secretly risked their lives to save the lives of others. Their names are inscribed on the wall around us here at Yad Vashem; they are forever inscribed on the tablets of our hearts.

You, Your Holiness, were a young witness to the tragedy. And as you wrote to your Jewish childhood friend, you felt, in some sense, as if you yourself experienced the fate of Polish Jewry. When my grandparents, Elka and Shmuel Godin, mounted the death trains at Umschlagplatz near their home in Warsaw, headed toward their fate at Treblinka – the fate of three million Jews from your homeland – you were there, and you remembered.

You have done more than anyone else to bring about the historic change in the attitude of the Church toward the Jewish people, initiated by the good Pope John XXIII, and to dress the gaping wounds that festered over many bitter centuries.

And I can say, Your Holiness, that your coming here today, to the Tent of Remembrance at Yad Vashem, is a climax of this historic journey of healing. Here, right now, time itself has come to a standstill – this very moment holds within it 2,000 years of history. And their weight is almost too much to bear…

Your Holiness, mine is a nation that remembers. However onerous the burden of memory, we may not avoid it, because without memory there can be neither culture nor conscience.

The establishment of the State of Israel against all odds – and the ingathering of the exiles – not only has restored to the Jewish people its honour and mastery over its fate; it is the definitive, permanent answer to Auschwitz. We have returned home, and since then, no Jew will ever remain helpless or be stripped of the last shred of human dignity.

Here, at the cradle of our civilization, we have rebuilt our home, so that it may thrive in peace and security. Defending our state has claimed a very heavy toll.

We are now resolved to find paths to historical reconciliation. We are in the midst of an enormous effort to secure comprehensive peace with our Palestinian neighbours, with Syria and Lebanon and with the entire Arab world.

Your Holiness, we have noted with appreciation your words about the unique bond of the Jewish people to Jerusalem that I quote you: "Jews love Jerusalem with a passion" from the days of David, who chose it as a capital, and from the days of Solomon, who built the Temple there. Therefore they turn to it in their prayers every day, and point to it as a symbol of their nation.

I would like to reiterate our absolute commitment to protect all rights and properties of the Catholic Church, as well as those of the Christian and Muslim institutions; to continue to ensure full freedom of worship to members of all faiths equally; and to keep united Jerusalem open and free, as never before, to all who love her. I know that you pray, as we do, for this unity and peace of Jerusalem:

"Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: Peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy palaces, for my brethren and companions' sake, I will now say, peace be within thee."

Your Holiness, you have come on a mission of brotherhood, of remembrance and of peace. And we say to you: Blessed are you in Israel.

'Memory makes us cry out'

The following are excerpts from the text of Pope John Paul II's speech last week at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial, as transcribed by the Associated Press:

In this place of memories, the mind and heart and soul feel an extreme need for silence. Silence in which to remember. Silence in which to try to make some sense of the memories which come flooding back. Silence because there are no words strong enough to deplore the terrible tragedy of the Shoah.

My own personal memories are of all that happened when the Nazis occupied Poland during the war. I remember my Jewish friends and neighbours, some of whom perished, while others survived. I have come to Yad Vashem to pay homage to the millions of Jewish people who, stripped of everything, especially of human dignity, were murdered in the Holocaust. More than half a century has passed, but the memories remain.

'No one can forget'

Here, as at Auschwitz and many other places in Europe, we are overcome by the echo of the heart-rending laments of so many. Men, women and children cry out to us from the depths of the horror that they knew. How can we fail to heed their cry? No one can forget or ignore what happened. No one can diminish its scale. We wish to remember. But we wish to remember for a purpose, namely to ensure that never again will evil prevail, as it did for the millions of innocent victims of Nazism.

How could man have such utter contempt for man? Because he had reached the point of contempt for God. Only a godless ideology could plan and carry out the extermination of a whole people.

The honour given to the righteous gentiles by the State of Israel at Yad Vashem for having acted heroically to save Jews, sometimes to the point of giving their own lives, is a recognition that not even in the darkest hour is every light extinguished. That is why the Psalms and the entire Bible, though well aware of the human capacity for evil, also proclaim that evil will not have the last word. Out of the depths of pain and sorrow, the believer's heart cries out: "I trust in You, O Lord: I say, 'You are my God.'" (Psalms 31:14)

Jews and Christians share an immense spiritual patrimony, flowing from God's self-revelation. Our religious teachings and our spiritual experience demand that we overcome evil with good. We remember, but not with any desire for vengeance or as an incentive to hatred. For us, to remember is to pray for peace and justice and to commit ourselves to their cause. Only a world at peace, with justice for all, can avoid repeating the mistakes and terrible crimes of the past.

As Bishop of Rome and successor of the Apostle Peter, I assure the Jewish people that the Catholic Church, motivated by the Gospel law of truth and love and by no political considerations, is deeply saddened by the hatred, acts of persecution and displays of anti-Semitism directed against the Jews by Christians at any time and in any place.

The Church rejects racism in any form as a denial of the image of the Creator inherent in every human being. In this place of solemn remembrance, I fervently pray that our sorrow for the tragedy which the Jewish people suffered in the 20th century will lead to a new relationship between Christians and Jews. Let us build a new future in which there will be no more anti-Jewish feeling among Christians or anti-Christian feeling among Jews, but rather the mutual respect required of those who adore the one Creator and Lord and look to Abraham as our common father in faith.

The world must heed the warning that comes to us from the victims of the Holocaust and the testimony of the survivors. Here at Yad Vashem, the memory lives on and burns itself onto our souls. It makes us cry out: "I hear the whispering of many – terror on every side – but I trust in You, O Lord: I say, 'You are my God.'"

Standing up to the Nazis

It is a long-held belief that during the 12 years of Nazi rule, it was too dangerous to oppose government policy and therefore out of the question to do so. Standing up to the Nazis was impossible.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In consequence, so we are led to conclude, any disagreement with the treatment of Jews would have been construed as a plot to overthrow the government, and therefore there was none until July 1944. Wrong, says a book by Nathan Stolzfus.

The event that the author describes occurred in early 1943, when the killings at Auschwitz were already in full gear. It was a time when the Nazi authorities decided to do something about the Jewish men who had married gentile women and were therefore considered to have committed "racial desecration" (so called Rassenschande). In one fell swoop, the majority of these Jews were rounded up in Berlin and transportation was readied to ship them eastward.

The government had not reckoned with the wives of these men, who, in fact, had for the last eight years refused to divorce their Jewish husbands and had thus already shown their courage.

The revolt of the women came shortly after Hitler had given an address in Munich in which he predicted the war would soon be over, because the destruction of European Jewry was at hand. (It was in fact the first public announcement of Germany's Holocaust program, but the world still did not believe it.)

Berlin was now under bombardment by the Allies, the defeat at Stalingrad was becoming public knowledge, and in this mixed atmosphere, 1,500 women demonstrated in the capital. They were the wives of the incarcerated husbands, and they – pure Aryans – demonstrated in order to save 1,500 Jews. The brave Bishop of Muenster, Count von Galen, supported the women.

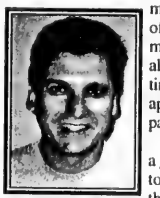
Now, the unimaginable happened. None other than the unspeakable minister of propaganda and chief of Berlin, Joseph Paul Goebbels, announced that the 1,500 Jews would be freed, and in fact – unbelievable as it now appears – some of those who had already been shipped out to Auschwitz were hauled back to join their families. In addition, the children of these mixed marriages, who themselves were in danger of annihilation, were given a reprieve.

This particular aspect of German resistance was certainly undertaken by people for their own benefit. But it was courage nonetheless, and it leads one to the inevitable conclusion: If there had been more Germans who had banded together to resist the evil, they might not have defeated it, but might have blunted its terrible efficiency.

The New York Times of Feb. 13 has an article about those who resisted and did save Jews.

Who are you going to call?

As Israeli newscasts go, the images of rioting the other day were nothing extraordinary. Far more noteworthy was what prompted the unrest. Behind the burning barricades and clashes with police was not the usual bitter labour dispute, religious-secular controversy or Palestinian outrage over the latest Jewish settlement expansion.



Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Instead, residents of the northern Druze town of Isfiya had taken to the streets against a modern scourge spreading throughout the country. In a loud, unequivocal voice, the people of Isfiya said they had had enough of what they consider a major health hazard threatening their community.

Their protest was directed at the latest intrusion by cellphone companies, which, in the past ten years, have installed scores of transmission antennas in Isfiya and thousands of others elsewhere in Israel. Police had to intervene in the town, situated southeast of Haifa, after youths forcibly prevented the Motorola company from erecting more antennas there and tore down others already in place. Their actions were sparked by fears that the transmitters could cause cancer.

Due to its high position on Mount Carmel, Isfiya has become a favoured site for cellphone companies to place antennas in, resulting in an especially heavy concentration of transmitters in a relatively small area. Residents say the village has suffered an inordinate number of cancer cases in recent years, which they blame largely on radiation emissions from the antennas.

Last year, Isfiya appealed to government authorities to limit the number of antennas in the town. The request fell on deaf ears. Finally this month after receiving no help from official channels, residents took the matter into their own hands – literally. Their activism, albeit violent at times, was in marked contrast to the apathy of most of their Jewish compatriots about environmental matters.

Given such complacency, it's not a great surprise that such issues rarely top Israel's public agenda. If once this was to be a land of milk and honey, today it's more a nation of antennas. From Metulla to Eilat, no region is spared these imposing metal poles topped by transmission boxes. Like so many exclamation marks on the skyline, transmitters – and the cellphones that depend on them – have become one of the defining symbols of modern Israeli life.

Everywhere you look, both in the city and in the countryside, on top of buildings or in fields, another antenna stands erect, quietly transmitting many of the phone conversations of the nation. And there's no letup in sight. With Israel's now famous passion for cellphones seemingly insatiable, and their use expanding at an exponential rate, the demand for reliable, clear service is greater than ever. To ensure such growth, there's no mystery about what is needed: more and bigger antennas on the horizon.

Faced with the choice between convenience and a potential health risk, the former usually rules the day, especially in Israel, where people consider it their inalienable right to converse anywhere, any time and at any cost on their mobile phones. Nothing must get in the way.

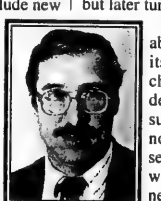
Admittedly, there is still no definitive scientific proof that the antennas cause cancer. The Environment Ministry, which conducted tests in Isfiya last year, insists the antennas there do not exceed the permitted international standard for radiation emissions set by the World Health Organization. But numerous experts dispute the WHO claim, seriously questioning the safety of such transmitters – and the cellphones to which they're linked.

Surprisingly, many Israelis seem oblivious to the antennas despite their ubiquitous presence throughout the country. Their rapid proliferation seems to have snuck up on the national consciousness too often diverted by the Big Issues of the Day.

That's why there was something refreshing about what happened in Isfiya this month. Beyond the politics and diplomacy that usually dominate public life in Israel, the residents of one town put their foot down, placing their health ahead of everything else. If such thinking catches on here, the day may come when it will no longer be enough for cellphone companies to simply provide better reception to their customers. In which case, the disturbances in Isfiya will have been a noisy but much-needed wake-up call to everybody.

Israel as the 51st state

In the effort to persuade Israelis to give up the Golan and sign an agreement with Syria, the Bill Clinton administration is offering an unprecedented security co-operation package. The components include new strategic weapons, such as Tomahawk cruise missiles, tens of billions of dollars in aid to pay for relocating bases, research programs and perhaps also an official mutual defence treaty. This will create a much more intense security relationship between Washington and Israel.



Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

However, the implications are not all positive, and the downside of such an agreement should be carefully considered.

For the past 52 years, Israel and the Jewish people have taken pride in our ability to defend ourselves. Despite the difficult situations, no foreign military forces (as distinct from volunteers in the Machal groups) were ever requested or sent to fight on behalf of Israel. This ability to stand on our own feet and defend our nation has been a central element of Zionism and the rebirth of Jewish national sovereignty. It should not and will not be given up easily.

Israel's self-reliance has also earned a high level of respect. As a result, when assistance was needed in terms of weapons or money, this was forthcoming as a means of helping Israel to defend herself. In some cases, such as the Menachem Begin government's decision to destroy the Iraqi nuclear reactor in 1981, Israel acted against the wishes of the Americans and other "friendly" governments, but later turned out to have been correct.

In contrast, if Israel is no longer able to act independently to defend its vital interests, all of this will change. The U.S. government, despite all of its power, and assuming the best of intentions, will not always agree with Israeli assessments, and will preach restraint when pre-emptive action may be necessary (as in 1967 or 1981). In 1991, the George Bush administration persuaded Israel not to retaliate after it was struck by Iraqi SCUD missiles, promising instead that the Americans would take care of the problem. Almost 10 years later, Saddam Hussein continues to threaten Israel and the world.

An Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights could increase the need for the type of pre-emptive military actions that the United States generally opposes.

If the Syrian border is returned to or near the old ceasefire lines that existed until 1967 and Syria begins to move troops towards the border or arms its missiles with warheads, the Israeli and American governments will have very little time to decide how to respond. While the danger would naturally be felt by Israel, Washington, with its global interests and domestic political concerns, is likely to prevaricate, as was the case in 1967, 1973 and 1990.

Similarly, in the event of terrorism launched from or supported by Syria, the United States would counsel caution and oppose Israeli retaliation. As long as Israeli and not American lives are endangered, the degree of commitment will remain uneven, and as a result of a defence alliance, the credibility of the Israeli deterrence capability would be eroded. Rather than providing a force multiplier, the Americans would be seen as a force restrainer.

In addition, a mutual defence treaty and the proposal to provide tens of billions of dollars in U.S. military aid to Israel would have the effect of turning Israel from a strategic asset and ally into a burden. A request for tens of billions of dollars in military aid to convince Israelis to support a peace treaty is not likely to go over well in most of the United States.

As a result of these factors, it is important to separate any proposed peace agreement with Syria, and withdrawal from the Golan Heights, from the negotiation of a new defence relationship with the United States. If withdrawal from the Golan renews the threat to Israeli security and national survival, a defence treaty with the United States will not provide compensation, and might even harm American support for Israel in the future.

The Kirshner File

The greatest theft in history

He describes it, purely and simply, as "the greatest theft in history."

"If you saw an opportunity to grab, you grabbed," said Richard Chesnoff, author of Pack of Thieves (Doubleday), a blistering account of the wholesale robbery by governments and individuals of money, property and art from European Jews before and during the Holocaust. "It was a mitzvah to steal from Jews."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Chesnoff, here recently to promote his book, estimates that European Jewish communities were robbed of $120 billion (US) in today's terms.

As he puts it: "In every nation of Europe where the genocidal Nazi machine dragged Jews away to their deaths, there were upstanding local citizens wanting to loot what was left – art dealers in Paris, hotelkeepers in Budapest, stockbrokers in Amsterdam, grocers in Lyons, department store owners in Brussels, manufacturers in Oslo, peasant farmers from Latvia to Transylvania, and everywhere bankers, lawyers and financiers, all barely able to contain themselves at the prospect of picking at the bones of their Jewish neighbours."

By his reckoning, no one was innocent.

Axis powers, notably Germany and Italy, committed the original sin. Neutrals – Switzerland, Sweden and Portugal – reaped enormous profits from the process. The Allies, after the war, turned a blind eye to the crying injustice.

Chesnoff, a 62-year-old American journalist, decided to write the book following an interview with the president of the World Jewish Congress, Edgar Bronfman. They had talked about the burgeoning scandal concerning dormant Jewish accounts in Swiss banks and the related question of restitution.

"That got me thinking," recalled Chesnoff, a U.S. News & World Report correspondent and a New York Daily News columnist who divides his time between New York City and a village in France. "I realized that there was a discernible pattern of plunder, not only on the part of the Nazis, but by others."

Switzerland, in other words, was merely the tip of a deeply submerged iceberg.

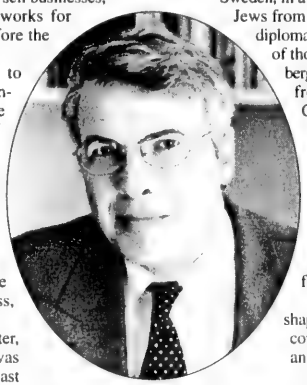
Chesnoff, who has covered stories as diverse as the Six Day War and the fall of the Berlin wall, spent five years researching and writing Pack of Thieves, which Bronfman, in a testimonial on the dustjacket, has called "electrifying."

Travelling to more than a dozen nations, he pored over hitherto classified files and interviewed scores of Holocaust survivors, families of victims and officials. He also drew on the knowledge of investigative reporters like Hector Feliciano (The Lost Museum: The Nazi Conspiracy to Steal the World's Greatest Works of Art, Basic Books), and read a mountain of secondary sources ranging from Philippe Burrin's France Under the Germans to Saul Friedlander's Nazi Germany and the Jews.

Despite the wealth of information in his book, Chesnoff is modest about its scope. It is not intended to be an encyclopedic or definitive record of what transpired. Nor is it an academic tract. It is, rather, a journalist's report, tracking human greed and/or indifference in 14 countries and the Vatican.

Chesnoff, naturally, begins with Germany, where the Nazi regime forced Jews to sell businesses, land, stocks, jewels and art works for grossly unfair prices even before the outbreak of World War II.

From there, he segues to Austria, where 26,236 Jewish-owned enterprises were Aryanized in the aftermath of the 1938 Anschluss.



Richard Chesnoff

In Holland, a country which has benefited from its association with Anne Frank, many Dutch Jews turned over assets to Christian neighbours, business partners and lawyers for safekeeping. Much of the property, however, was never returned. Postwar petitions from Jews were often met with ambivalence and coolness, according to Chesnoff.

Jews in Norway did not fare much better, even after the war. A reparation board was supposed to return Jewish funds, but at least 70 percent of assets had been looted before they could be registered. "Everything that belonged to Jews was confiscated by quislings and sold at auctions at discounted prices," noted Chesnoff.

The plunder of internationally significant art in France originally in the possession of Jews was staggering. Nazi records indicate that 21,903 truly great works of art were shipped from France to Germany from 1940 to 1944.

In Poland, where Jews were heavily involved in the economy and owned 40 percent of the real estate in Warsaw on the eve of the war, the toll was mind-boggling. By 1940, the confiscation of Jewish property was complete, "sequestered in the public interest." The London-based Polish government-in-exile was hardly sympathetic, pointing out that "the return of masses of Jews would be perceived not as an act of restitution, but as an invasion…" The attitude of Polish governments after 1945 was more or less coloured by this perception.

With the liberation of Hungary in 1945, Jewish communal property was restored to the Central Council of Hungarian Jews. But the properties of religious bodies were expropriated.

The neutrals played a profitable game.

Spain and Portugal readily provided Germany and its Swiss bankers with a conveniently accessible system of central banks for concealing and then trading looted gold bullion. Once in Spain and Portugal, the loot could be transformed into convertible currencies. Both also supplied Germany with wolfram, a vital mineral used to manufacture armour piercing shells.

Sweden, in a supreme act of humanity, accepted 7,000 Jews from Nazi-occupied Denmark. And Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg heroically saved tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews. But Wallenberg's uncles bought stocks and bonds stolen from Jews in Holland, and Sweden sold Germany critical war supplies (iron ore and ball-bearings) and gave the Germans transit rights across its territory. This facilitated Germany's occupation of Norway.

Argentina also helped Germany immeasurably. Some 200 German companies established offices in Argentina and operated without local financial controls from 1942 onward.

Realizing that the restitution struggle is shaped in part by new developments and discoveries, Chesnoff ends Pack of Thieves with an update of the issues as of July 15, 1999.

Germany plans to compensate slave and forced labourers. Austria is returning works of art, though Austrian banks have yet to settle additional claims pertaining to Aryanized Jewish property. The Czech Republic has compiled a dismal record. Norway, meanwhile, has become the model of how to deal with this sensitive subject. In Poland, there have been mixed results. Last week, Holland announced it would give the Jewish community $180 million in compensation for injustices endured by Jews under the Nazi occupation.

Chesnoff believes that squabbling over restitution funds can best be avoided if survivors with legitimate claims and needs, as well as victims' heirs, are duly compensated. The leftover funds should be channelled into a foundation for Israel and the Diaspora.

In parting, he said that "Shoah shysters," lawyers who charge exorbitant fees for their services, should be exposed. "They are charging two, three times their usual rate, though some lawyers are working pro bono."

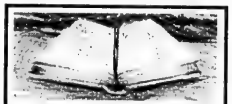
Shocked by Rav Yosef

By RABBI BARRY GELMAN

Here we go again.

I was shocked when I heard of Rav Ovadiah Yosef's recent remarks about Yossi Sarid.

One would have hoped that someone of the stature of Israel's former Sephardi Chief Rabbi Yosef would know better then to use irresponsible and even dangerous language in the political arena – referring to Meretz MK Yossi Sarid as the "dark side," likening him to satan, and asking how long we have to suffer this wicked man.



Rabbinic Reflections

From there, Rabbi Yosef turned prophet, forecasting that "God will extirpate him, the way he will extirpate Amalek."

If that wasn't bad enough, Rabbi Yosef continued by exclaiming: "Cursed is Haman. Cursed is Yossi Sarid. He must be uprooted from the seed of Israel."

One would have hoped that all of world Jewry, no, all of the world would have learned the lessons of the Rabin assassination.

What is so troubling about these statements is that they so resemble what other rabbis were saying about Yitzhak Rabin prior to his assassination. One prominent rabbi referred to Rabin as a rodeph, a pursuer, one who according to Jewish law must be killed in order to save your own life. Not long after that Rabin was murdered.

Whether or not there was intent to incite is not the issue. The issue is that many in Israel have not learned the power of language. Many in Israel do not understand that one is able to disagree, even oppose with vigour a particular opinion, while at the same time not falling into the trap of de-legitimization.

Such demonizing removes the humanity of a person. Yossi Sarid is no longer Yossi Sarid, Jew, father, doer of good deeds and Zionist (even if one disagrees with him).

Yossi Sarid is now the sub-human satan and Haman, and Haman as the offspring of Amalek must be erased.

I find it even more striking that Rabbi Yosef, who is himself a member of the Sephardi community, a community often on the receiving end of unfair and cruel stereotypes and biases, was not sensitive enough to recognize how harmful his words could be.

Finally, in using these words on the days preceding Purim, when we read in Megillat Esther that all of the Jews were able to unite for a common purpose, Rabbi Yosef has once again fuelled the flame of division. There exists a great rift between the religious and the secular in Israel today, and comments like those of Rabbi Yosef take us further and further away from the unity and civilized dialogue that we so desperately need.

Rabbi Shlomo Aviner, writing one week before the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, said that what is sorely needed in Israel today is the ability to distinguish between a person and his or her particular philosophy. An idea may be despised; the person expressing the idea may never be despised. We dare not characterize and label our political opponents at the expense of erasing their humanity.

Rabbi Gelman is the spiritual leader of Shaar Hashomayim Congregation in Montreal.

Wiesel memoirs complete

And the Sea Is Never Full*, by Elie Wiesel (Random House).

Five years ago Elie Wiesel published the first portion of his memoirs, All Rivers Run To The Sea, the story of his life up to 1969. Now, with And The Sea Is Never Full (the two titles complete a verse from Ecclesiastes), he deals with the manifold experiences of his last three decades.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The author is perhaps the best known and most passionate advocate of the need to remember the Holocaust. He was 16 when American soldiers found him among the living dead at Buchenwald. He writes of an agreement that he made with his fellow inmates "that the one among us who would be saved would testify for all of us." And this challenge has never left him. "I will become militant. I will teach, share, bear witness. I will reveal and try to mitigate the victims' solitude." It is the unfailing theme in his numerous books, articles, speeches and encounters.

Wiesel is tireless, his energy boundless, his sympathies broad and his travels unceasing. One must marvel at a range of activities that includes his exploits as human rights activist: a meeting in Paris to protest UNESCO's policy towards Israel, a 1980 march for Cambodia, a trip to South Africa to witness apartheid.

We follow Wiesel's teaching exploits at City College in New York, at Boston University and at Yale. We accompany him on a speaking tour that takes him from Washington to Moscow, we hear Lamentations read at a Tisha b'Av service in Warsaw, and we learn of his troubled involvement in the U.S. Memorial Holocaust Council.

The author's encounters with the great and near great of our time are revealing – from David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir, Teddy Kollek and Yitzhak Rabin to presidents Jimmy Carter, Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton. His close relationship with President François Mitterand of France came to an abrupt close when it was discovered that Mitterand had concealed his Vichy past and his friendship with a French chief of police who had aided the Gestapo in their deportation of French Jews.

French Archbishop Jean-Marie Lustiger – a convert to Christianity – confessed to Wiesel that he felt Jewish. "I refuse," he said "to renounce my roots, my Jewishness. How can I betray my mother's memory?"

Wiesel explains to him that from ancient days, Judaism has meant separation and choice. "One can not belong to two religions," and he pleads with Lustiger, "At least cease defining yourself as a fulfilled Jew."

Wiesel is not universally admired. His adversaries who regard him as brash, self-anointed and self-seeking include Simon Wiesenthal, the famous Nazi hunter. The author responds "Poor Wiesenthal. How is one to comprehend his rage and hate? Our sages have an explanation: ambition, jealousy. In The Ethics of Our Fathers we read that jealousy 'excludes man from this world.' Let us say that, in Wiesenthal's case, it blinds him. I feel sorry for him."

The famous Bitburg affair is discussed in detail. At the White House during a policy meeting to discuss Reagan's contemplated trip to the German military cemetery, a Jewish community leader who was present reported: "Did you notice that during the discussion Patrick Buchanan was doodling, scribbling on the yellow pad in front of him? Since I was sitting on his right, I glanced over. Would you believe me if I tell you that he was scrawling two words over and over 'Jewish pressure, Jewish pressure.' That is what obsessed him in this whole affair, that is what he is afraid of."

Simply but eloquently written, replete with anecdotes, this enlivening memoir brings to life a many-sided, gifted, militant idealist, as well as some of the salient Jewish events of our era.

You've always dreamed of retiring in Israel...

More Jewish humour

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Q. Who was the greatest male financier in the Bible?
A. Noah – he was floating his stock while everyone else was in liquidation.

Oy! I just can't resist those Bible riddles from Rabbi Amy Scheinerman [http://ezra.mts.jhu.edu/~rabbiars/humor/index.html].

Today, I continue my look at the best of Jewish humour on the Internet with some new sites and some classics.

One site new to me is Kishka.com: News that Hits you in the Gut [http://www.kishka.com]. This site takes a biting and silly look at the latest news and gives it a strange Jewish twist. Nothing is too sacred (even the sacred) for their satire. Here are a couple of milder examples from Kishka.com:

"New York residents are paying 52 percent more for their cholent than they did just one month ago, and the prices are at their highest level ever, according to a recent government funded study. 'Just one month ago consumers paid an average of $2.20 per gallon of crude cholent,' said Robert Liebenthal, dean of Jewish Studies at Brooklyn College. 'By this Friday,' Liebenthal continued, 'the statewide average was $3.16 per gallon of crude cholent.' Crude cholent includes beans, barley, potatoes, and flanken."

Another piece profiles how George W. Bush will do just about anything, even eat gefilte fish, to court the Jewish vote. And in an article about the nasty fallout from the TV show Who Wants to Marry a Multi-Millionaire? there's this headline: Americans Can't Even Get a Shidduch Right.

Even stranger than Kishka.com is Jewish Men in Togas [http://www.jewishmeninotogas.com]. You'll find Jewish jokes, strange (but true) news stories about Jews and Israel... and yes, photos of some Jewish men in togas.

Over at the University of Pennsylvania, some zealous students have assembled several humorous articles at [http://dolphin.upenn.edu/~ocp/TXT/MYST_ARC]. In the Minyan Penal Code, they address the decorum problem which plagues many congregations by recommending a violation and fine schedule. Sample violations and fines: "Taking seat of person called to Torah: Fine – $72; Taking seat of Rabbi during speech: Fine – $360 (Fine waived if speech is longer than 30 minutes)."

Do you love Yiddish humour but hate what happens in the translation?

Harry Leichter's Yiddish humour page presents jokes in the original Yiddish but with English transliteration [http://www.haruth.com/JhumorYiddish.html]. A sample: Ron kommt zum Schneider, seinen Anzug messen. Nach 3 Tagen... noch nicht fertig. Nach 8 Tagen... noch nicht fertig. Nach 12 Tagen... noch nicht fertig. Sagt Ron: "Der liebe Gott hat die ganze Welt in 6 Tagen geschaffen!!!" Nu – Ja, schau dir aber den Anzug an und schau dir die Welt an! (Hey, you don't expect me to spoil it in the translation, do you!)

Do you have a joke to share or would you like to get a regular supply in your mailbox? Subscribe to a couple of Jewish humour e-mail lists and the jokes will be delivered to you on a regular basis. There's Dani Wassner's Jewish Humour list [http://www.vjlists.com/jewish-humor/index.htm] Also take a look at the JCN Jokes and Humour Forum [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/forum/forum.idc?ForumID=14] and a similar one from Jewish Family [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/article.asp?ArticleID=450].

And since I started the column asking about a male Biblical figure, it's only fair to leave you with you with this:
Q. Who was the greatest female financier in the Bible?
A. Pharaoh's daughter – she went down to the bank of the Nile and drew out a little prophet.

Western sexual laxity

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

In a famous passage, the Mishnah stipulates that the laws of forbidden sexual relations may not be discussed in the presence of even three people. But in the fantasy land of the West, it would seem that there are very few nooks and crannies left in which to avoid the topic of sex, least of all in education.

As our society trumpets frank expression as a virtue, today's teenagers and even preteens communicate, dress and act out in a realm where their emotional maturity cannot possibly catch up to the movie-feigned romance and theatre of body talk in which they are enveloped.

What does one call a Jewish celebration where 12 and 13-year-old girls parade in absurdly immodest clothes and their male peers practise their best adult lewdness? In many cases, unfortunately, I call that a contemporary bar or bat mitzvah party. What exactly are the youngsters, not to mention their parents, modelling here?

Disregarding William Butler Yeats' lament in Sailing to Byzantium – "That is no country for old men" – the parents are off dancing to the latest Billboard 100 hit, turning yet another Jewish spiritual rite into one more mindless Dionysian spectacle. Little wonder their children follow suit.

Despite what our dinner party interpretations of Freud suggest, sex is far more than an innate urge. How one thinks and acts in this domain is to a large degree influenced and compelled by the culture in which one abides. Commenting on the long-standing halachic obligation for married couples to engage in such relations at least once a week, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein insightfully notes that because of the sexually charged atmosphere of contemporary culture, "a woman feels desire and erotic passion more often than once a week." This "feeling" is seemingly inhaled from the very air we breathe; sex in Rav Moshe's formulation becomes a cultural construction.

Nobody absorbs this on a visceral level more than our children, who are unwittingly swayed and catapulted into believing that they should be joking and talking about – if not having – sex, and at earlier ages. Naturally this does not apply to all of our children, but no one is immune from the whiff of innocence lost.

So dealing with the reality of our children's immersion in a sexually drunk world has thus become a major component of religious education. Any careful investigation of Jewish sources replaces the "hole in the sheet" mythology – frankly, just another excuse by ignorant people to bash the tradition – with a rather sophisticated, pragmatic and sensitive rendering of human passion.

Judaism has much to say about how we and our children should respect our bodies and the seed of life contained within. We must impress on our children, not just by word but by deed, that there is a better and, ultimately, a holier way to think about sex and relationships. Without fear, and with empathy, we must take back the night.

Jewish students win anti-racism awards

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Jewish students were among the members of the 10 Canadian school teams that won the Panasonic Stop Racism National Video Competition.

Jeff Reuben

Jeff Reuben of Winnipeg and David Waldman of Toronto both did their part in opposing racism in the recent cross-Canada endeavour that attracted 242 team entries.

The winning teams were treated to four days in Ottawa in early March, courtesy of the Multicultural Program of the Department of Canadian Heritage. They also took part in the taping of the International Stop Racism Concert and awards show and attended a forum on racism and ethnic hatred.

Edited versions of the videos were to be broadcast on YTV and internationally on Mar. 21, the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

David Waldman

At Winnipeg's Shaughnessy Park School, Reuben, a 15-year-old Grade 8 student, worked with four of his peers to produce a one-minute video called The Missing Piece.

The video shows almost 100 students walking into the shape of a rainbow. The message delivered by one of the students is: "A rainbow wouldn't be a rainbow without its colours."

Making the video and visiting Ottawa was a "really great experience," said Reuben, who is a DJ and would like to have his own dance club for teens.

Video debunks negative stereotypes

He is "much too modest," according to his Technical Arts teacher Sharon Shafto. "He is our sound expert at school."

Waldman, 16, worked on a video titled I Have a Dream with fellow Grade 11 students Sarah Fay and Christina Hang, as part of Northview Heights Secondary School's CyberARTS/Communications Technology program.

"We all have strong feelings against racism and discrimination," Waldman told The CJN. "We really wanted the message to get across."

The minute-and-a-half video, which took almost a month to complete, features teens from diverse backgrounds quoting the late civil rights leader Martin Luther King and debunking negative stereotypes. "I don't drink vodka," said a young man with a Russian accent. "I don't just listen to reggae," noted a black girl. "I don't always eat with chopsticks," said her Asian counterpart.

"We have a very multicultural school," said Barry Schafer, the students' Communications Technology teacher, "and all the courses try to work in themes of dealing with racism and possible solutions."

BBYO sets sights on eastern Europe

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) is expanding to countries within eastern Europe, says Elana Okrent, international president of B'nai Brith Girls, a division of BBYO.

In August, a Romanian chapter sent a delegate to BBYO's international convention in Pennsylvania, and about three years ago, BBYO members from the United States and Israel began attending a Passover seder in Bulgaria – now an annual tradition.

Okrent, an 18-year-old from Seattle, Wash., visited Toronto recently as part of a national tour.

Her job as president requires her to travel to BBYO regions across the globe. She has already visited most of the United States and will travel to Israel in May.

During our interview in the B'nai Brith Youth Organization office on Bathurst Street,

Elana Okrent

Okrent spoke about the importance of Mind, Body and Attitude, a program for B'nai Brith girls started in 1994.

The program focuses on issues relevant to women, such as eating disorders, date rape and teenage pregnancy. It also provides an opportunity to include mothers of BBYO members in programming.

"We have gotten huge attendance at these programs," Okrent said.

But Okrent admitted that BBYO has experienced "hills and valleys in membership.

"Five years ago, the membership was a lot higher than we have now," she said.

In the 1998-1999 year, when membership fees were increased by $20 there was a 1,500 member decline, she said.

But this school year has seen an increase in membership.

From September to December, there were more members internationally than during the same period in 1998, she said.

This year, Aleph Zadik Aleph – the boys' component of BBYO – celebrates its 75th anniversary.

"It has been a good way to attract alumni and raise money," Okrent said.

BBYO hopes this year's anniversary will encourage alumni to come back to the youth organization and show them that their chapters still exist, she said.

Yiddish classes planned

TORONTO — The Yiddish class at Adath Israel Synagogue is beginning again on Wednesday, April 15, from 7.30 to 9.30 p.m.

After a winter hiatus, the experienced teacher, David Newman, will resume his classes under the sponsorship of the Beit Midrash at Adath Israel.

The fees for the 10-week course for intermediate students are $18 for members, and $36 for non-members; all seniors (60 plus) pay $18.

For more information, call him at 416-495-0919.

Bashevkin puts focus on women, democratic process

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Academia

Women in western societies are better off today than their mothers and grandmothers. But the battle for full equal rights with men has yet to be won, according to University of Toronto political scientist Sylvia Bashevkin.

She should know. A proud feminist, Bashevkin is an authority on the status of women in Canada, the United States and Britain.

And when Bashevkin, the mother of two children, looks back at the progress women have made in the past century, she expresses a sense of amazement.

"There are enormous educational and occupational opportunities available to many women in many countries today that were not offered 100 years ago," she said.

"We need to recall that the provincial franchise was only granted to women in Quebec in 1940, the same year they became eligible to hold elective office at the provincial level.

"These important legal freedoms, however, coexist alongside worrisome challenges to social rights – particularly the social rights of less affluent women. In Ontario, Alberta and quite a few U.S. states, single mothers with very young children may be coerced by threat of withdrawal of social assistance benefits into the virtually full-time paid labour force. Legal gains have therefore been accompanied in some places by an erosion of crucial social citizenship rights."

Bashkevin, whose focus is women and the democratic process, believes that they have made important advances in Canada in terms of political rights and the attainment of positions on the Supreme Court and high legislative office.

"The appointment of the first female Supreme Court justice speaks to this enormous process," explains Bashevkin, whose latest book, Women on the Defensive (University of Toronto Press), examines women's movements and political conservatism under the administrations of Brian Mulroney, Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan.

"Yet we have seen very, very few women win the leadership of a political party that could be expected to win the next election," she adds. "Women tend to enjoy greater success in contesting party leadership in situations of low competitiveness, when a party is 'on the ropes' and in need of some kind of miracle. The case of Kim Campbell in the federal Conservative party is an example."

Bashevkin, whose interest in women and politics was stimulated during graduate school at the University of Michigan and York University, says that feminists in Canada, Britain and the United States concur on a number of policies and goals.

As she puts it, "They agree that the legal status of women needs to be improved, that employment rights and child care provisions are essential, that choice is necessary in the area of reproductive health, that family law has to take account of the experiences of wives and mothers, and that violence against women must be addressed in a comprehensive way."

Bashevkin, who defines feminism as the organized pursuit of social, economic and legal equality for women, was asked to assess the strength of the feminist movement compared to earlier eras.

"Measuring it is always difficult, since these movements are not political parties with direct poll results in every election," she observed. "But women's movements in many advanced industrial democracies are quite strong if one examines public opinion data on support for their agendas."

The majority of Canadians think that women should receive equal pay for their work, and endorse a pro-choice position on abortion, she allowed.

Sylvia Bashevkin

Yet the rise of socially conservative politicians has brought to the fore very traditional ideas about families and hence the role of women. "Feminist movements are therefore effective at one level and at the same time they are embattled at another," she points out.

Bashevkin, who is currently working on a project about social policy under Bill Clinton, Jean Chretien and Tony Blair, says that women in the West still face formidable obstacles.

"There exists a deep-seated assumption that western societies have instituted enough equality changes, so that people who care about human rights can sit back and relax."

It's a fallacy, she warns. "In the face of a resurgent and often intolerant political right in a variety of countries, this is a very dangerous myth."

Bashevkin, whose PhD thesis was titled, Women and Change: A Comparative Study of Political Attitudes in France, Canada and the United States, was born in North Adams, a small town in Massachusetts, in 1954.

She was drawn to political science as a third-year student at Tel Aviv University. While there, she was a field interviewer for a study on immigrant absorption in Israel.

Her ties to Israel go back even further, being a graduate of the Mollie Goodman School in Kfar Silver. She attended that high school with the support of an uncle who was active in the Zionist Organization of America.

Bashevkin maintains a relationship with her Alma Mater. Last December, she delivered a public lecture at Tel Aviv University on The Limits of Personhood: Women's Citizenship in Contemporary Perspective. And at the Hebrew University, she talked about welfare reform in Canada, Britain and the United States.

Jewish school board helps teachers assist children

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A select group of 14 Jewish educators has been given a gift by the Jewish community – but they are expected to pass it on to others and in fact have begun to do so, said the director of educational services of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

Yael Seliger, speaking in an interview in her small, book-filled office, was referring to the Reflective Practice program, a joint venture of the BJE and York University's Jewish Teacher Education Program as well as participating schools.

The program, for which they brought in the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Professor Ora Zohar, is based on the idea of teachers as nurturers and was designed to address students' non-academic needs. Zohar has also trained teachers in Israel, South Africa, Australia and Europe.

The program's name refers to the idea of teachers reflecting on their role in the classroom. "It's a wonderful vehicle for teachers to grow," said Seliger.

Michal Gill, a middle school teacher at United Synagogue Day School, said Zohar's concepts have given her many tools to be a more effective teacher.

To use an analogy of Zohar's, Gill is no longer marching, but dancing. "I move in different directions, adjust to different situations more quickly. I cater to the needs of each child more easily."

Teachers today are under "unbelievable pressure," Seliger said. "They're not just teaching academic subjects, but also addressing issues that come with families: deaths, separations, people struggling with the economy."

To qualify for the Reflective Practice program, teachers needed leadership ability, good communications skills and the respect of their peers, said Anne Glickman, supplementary school and Jewish family education consultant and director of the BJE's Teachers' Resource Centre.

They also had to want the training very badly, said Seliger. The sessions, which took place over nine days in November and nine days in February as well as a number of evenings, included "a pile of reading. There was lots of homework every day."

"We hope it will prevent some of the burnout of some of the teachers," said Glickman. "It will give them the tools to cope with all the issues, and also create a network of teachers who speak the same language and [serve as] a support group."

The reflective practice program is one of about 10 teacher training initiatives offered by the BJE.

Others include family education and a program called ETGAR (Hebrew for "challenge"). The family education project, an attempt to empower parents to take on a Jewish educational role at home, got off the ground five years ago with a continuity grant from UJA FEDERATION, which funds all BJE programs. ETGAR was the brainchild of BJE director Seymour Epstein and fosters creative endeavours by individual teachers.

Legislature to retain prayer

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Lord's Prayer will continue to open sessions of Ontario's legislature, despite calls from Canadian Jewish Congress to do away with the practice.

"Most" of the legislature's 103 members want to retain the prayer, Speaker Gary Carr said last week, and only they can bring about change.

This month, Congress wrote to Carr and to Municipal Affairs Minister Tony Clement, pointing out that a recent Ontario Court of Appeal ruling found the recitation of the prayer to be unconstitutional because it violates religious freedom by "imposing" a Christian tone on deliberations.

The court upheld a complaint by Henry Freitag, a Jewish resident of Penetanguishene, that he felt coerced to stand and take part in the prayer that is contrary to his beliefs.

But Carr said parliamentary privilege allows the legislature to continue reciting the prayer, despite the court ruling.

Congress also noted that at least one Ontario municipality, Carleton Place, is ignoring the court ruling by opening council meetings with the Lord's Prayer.

Clement has not yet decided on a course of action.

Congress Ontario region chair Keith Landy said a court challenge to the legislature's stand is up to CJC's national officers.

If a challenge is brought, "I'm confident that the precedent as set in the Freitag case will be followed.

"There's no cogent argument to retain [the prayer]. In the diversity and multiculturalism of Ontario, all persons entering the legislature should feel comfortable.

"The legislature is continuing to set a Christian moral tone in the chamber."

Freitag has launched a complaint to the Ontario Human Rights Commission, over the legislature's use of the prayer.

TOWN HALL MEETING

On March 14, The Canadian Jewish News and Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) of Toronto sponsored a Town Hall meeting at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill, on the subject of The Changing Jewish Family.

It was the first ever joint project by The CJN and JF&CS.

The meeting was an attempt to create an additional forum for the free-wheeling exchange of ideas on contemporary issues of importance to the Jewish community, locally, nationally and abroad.

The problems confronting the modern Jewish family – financial, behavioral, sociological, parental or educational – are indeed among the most important of "contemporary issues" facing our community.

By bringing together a group of knowledgeable, caring and committed individuals to discuss these issues, The CJN and JF&CS hoped to generate "new" thinking on the matter and perhaps to strive to move closer to some solutions.

Dr. Mervin F. Verbit, professor of sociology at Brooklyn College of the City University of New York delivered the keynote address.

A specialist in the sociology of religion and contemporary Jewish life, Verbit spoke about the importance, for both the Jewish and the general community, of strengthening the "traditional" family unit, and challenged the community to adopt policies supportive of traditional families.

Responding briefly to Verbit's remarks were Terry Kaye, the director of family and community services at JF&CS, and Dr. Jack Brandes, head of the marital and family therapy program at the Toronto Hospital and assistant professor at the University of Toronto department of psychiatry.

Kaye wondered out loud how Verbit's challenge to the audience – urging the community leadership to implement policies that buttress the family structure – could be implemented at the practical level on a daily basis at an agency such as the JF&CS.

Brandes elaborated upon the historical reasons for the shift away, in Jewish communities worldwide, from the traditional family unit. He suggested an increase in all manner and all ages of Jewish education would be the beginning prescription for a return by Jews to a more traditional way of family life.

By the end of the meeting, there seemed to be a consensus that the community must shelter and protect the traditional family unit in ways that are in step with the advances in modern civilization, but which, at the same time, hold fast to the eternal values that, in the first place, raised the family unit to its pre-eminent place and role in Jewish life and history.

In the accompanying two pages we publish a report of the meeting.

The changing Jewish family...

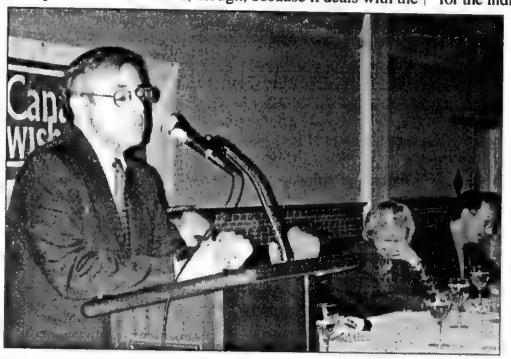
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — The Jewish community needs to do whatever it can to capture and build upon the strengths of the traditional Jewish family, says Mervin Verbit, a professor of sociology at Brooklyn College of the City University of New York.

"We should try to keep a traditional approach to families in a society that will tear them apart," he said at a recent Town Hall meeting, entitled The Changing Jewish Family, co-sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News and Jewish Family and Child Service.

What has kept our religion alive, he said, is the ability to adjust to the world around us. "However, we also maintain our own values and our own traditions.

"Both principles work. The issue confronting all Jews then, is knowing when to adjust, and when to dig in our heels and resist," he said.



Prof. Verbit delivering his keynote address.

Traditional vs. alternative families

In contemporary society, he said, two images of the family compete with each other. "One is usually referred to as the traditional family, and the other, having no conventionally accepted designation, might be called the alternative family. Data on Jews show a recent shift from the traditional to the alternative."

Citing a number of key differences between the two types of families, Verbit said that in the traditional perspective, marriage is a total and unique relationship. "Biblically, a man leaves his parents and becomes one being with his wife, and most adults marry for most of their lives. According to [many] rabbis, what God does, is make matches. This is what keeps creation in place.

"The alternative approach, though, makes both marriage and singlehood acceptable options. A non-traditional marriage is an institution whose purpose is the self-realization of husband and wife – each is responsible for their own fulfillment," said Verbit.

Judaism permits divorce for any reason, he said, but traditionally it is seen as a tragedy and a failure. "Loving couples should be able to find their way back to each other.

"Alternative families view divorce as an acceptable step when the relationship no longer meets the couple's needs, and steps are taken as matter of factly as possible. The divorce rate itself fuels a higher divorce rate."

Traditional couples have children, said Verbit, except when there are medical difficulties, and raising children is the primary task of their lives. A poor man is successful if his children are successful.

"Non-traditionally, child-bearing is one option among many – and not necessarily the noblest – for how people use their time and resources. People are not considered successful, unless they are successful in their own careers."

What is ironic, he said, is that the same attributes that make people successful at their work – organizational skills, diplomacy, and making decisions that affect people's lives – are the very same attributes that parents need to raise their children. It does not have the same status, though, because it deals with the family, rather than with the economy.

The extended family is the traditional support system and social circle, said Verbit. "Immigrants in North America almost always had a newly arrived cousin living with them. In alternative families, relatives may gather to mark life occasions, but they try not to impose on one another."

Individualism vs. 'societalism'

The differences in the two types of families, said Verbit, "manifest two different definitions of life's meaning – individualism and societalism."

Individualism, he said, is one of the key themes of modern times. "Economics and psychology are rooted in it. The assumption is that...the major goal is autonomy."

In societalism, which is the Jewish tradition, our own interests have validity, but the individual draws significance as a result of [his or her] place in the system," he said.

Jewish tradition, he said, is about the importance of social order. "The Torah could not be received until the community was ready to receive it.

"In the Jewish perspective, life is not about individualism...The traditional family is the paradigm and training ground for the links between people and society. If Jews accept alternative norms, they are not only adapting their principles to new realities, they are giving up basic Jewish ideals."

The purpose of life is to find fulfillment through relationships, and marriage is the only relationship that is comprehensive; a husband and wife have absolute access to each other, he said."Everything is the business of the other person. Judaism says that the individual is not adequate to fulfil the purpose of life."

Our children, he said, are our contribution to the future. That is the social responsibility for the individual in the world. We cannot live an ideal life, however, in a less than ideal culture. We need to help each other out.

How the community can help

Raising Jewish families is expensive, he said, and the community should help them grow. "We should use the Jewish community's institutions to compensate as much as possible for the damage our society does to family life.

" A few suggestions include providing appropriate day care, and advocating for flexible time jobs so mothers and fathers can do serious parenting. Jewish space should be made available for major family occasions at a nominal cost.

"We should also arrange for Jewish singles to meet, and we should advocate for government funding in order to enable the sandwich generation to care for their aging and ill parents at home."

Nothing will solve all the problems, said Verbit, "but we will demonstrate that we are trying to establish an approach that some say is outmoded.

"Whatever specific programs they adopt, Jewish communities, their institutions and their leaders should always be clear about Judaism's position. This is not the first time that Judaism opposed a surrounding ideology, and it is not likely to be the last.

"The measure of the Jewish people's contribution to our age, will be the extent to which we bring Judaism's perspective to a still unredeemed world," he said.

What makes JF&CS Jewish

A "properly functioning" agency, such as JF&CS, does whatever is necessary to help anyone who needs help, "even if they disagree with us. We need to articulate what we stand for and help people, not because they agree with us, but because they need help...

"We have to treat everyone with love and understanding, and hope that they will come to understand. We need to help, and still stand for our principles."

When asked what makes JF&CS Jewish, he said that it does whatever is needed.

Mervin Verbit

'We have to treat everyone with love and understanding'

"Judaic ideals means that we decide what services are needed, and then collect the money."

In a community, said Verbit, people do not need to agree with one another, they just need to agree that they are part of the community. "The [ideal] community does go beyond the family, but its model and its training ground is the family.

"We are much more than family, but without the family, we are nothing. It is the fundamental building block of our future," he said.

'Blending philosophy with practicality'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Balancing a dedication to Jewish values and traditions with the obligation to serve those who don't share that commitment is a constant challenge to Jewish Family & Child Service staff, said Terry Kaye, the agency's director of family and community services.

Kaye, along with psychiatrist Jack Brandes, head of the marital and family therapy program at Toronto Hospital and assistant professor at the University of Toronto department of psychiatry, was responding to comments by Mervin Verbit, professor of sociology at Brooklyn College in New York.

The three were speaking at a town hall meeting on The Changing Jewish Family, co-sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service and The Canadian Jewish News. The event was held at the Sephardic Kehila Centre.

"We struggle with what is the 'Jewish' in Jewish Family & Child Service," Kaye said, adding that the two "crash against each other."

It is a matter of "blending philosophy with practicality," she said.

Kaye said working at JF&CS is "like grand opera," having to deal with the myriad problems facing the Jewish family today – poverty, abuse, the homeless, the lost, the violent.

These are the same problems faced by general society, she said, but Jews are facing them "in an environment that is not always respectful of ethnic differences."

The difficulties are played out particularly in the area of immigration from eastern Europe and in dealing with adolescents, she said.

Many families coming from the former Soviet Union have lived for three generations cut off from Jewish practice, she said. "How do you deal with them and with their children without a commonality with the [local] community?"

It is imperative to actively listen to teenagers, she said. "If we refuse to listen to their problems, which may include AIDS, sexual orientation, violence or drugs, how can we expect them to follow us or to carry on our traditions?"

Brandes agreed with Verbit and Kaye that it is "critical" to decide "what is Jewish about the Jewish family."

The Jewish community, he said, quoting University of Toronto professor David Novak, is "still suffering from the body-blow of the French Revolution and the period of Enlightenment that followed."

Suddenly, he said, Jews could become a citizen of any country in Europe. "This changed the structure of the Jewish community."

Before this, he said, Jews could not leave the ghetto, within which the community reinforced the value system of the Jewish family and "transmitted that which went from generation to generation."

Now, the Jewish community is fragmented, he said. "Everyone says they are the voice of the Jewish community, but who is? Reform? Conservative? Reconstructionist? Egalitarian? Orthodox? What kind of Orthodoxy?"

There is a dichotomy between those who follow a liberal agenda, which says that you can pick what you like from Judaism and leave the rest, and the "conserving" part, which forgets what the past was. One, Brandes said, implies a fear of the past, the other a fear of the future.

The process of halachic evolution has stopped, he said, part of a "circling of the wagons" mentality that sees the world as evil.

Emphasis on halachic details, like what makes a chicken kosher, doesn't answer the questions of the serious problems of the day, such as sexuality, AIDS or abuse.

Brandes suggested that the cure for the problems besetting the Jewish family is to encourage learning about Judaism ("so kids don't have to go to Katmandu, rappers or The Grateful Dead to find spirituality"), and to offer support both to families in turmoil and to healthy ones.

Most of all, he insisted, "Don't worry about interfaith dialogue – reach out within our own. Let the Lubavitchers speak to the Reform, and the Conservatives to Haredim."

German view of Jews changed in the 1960s, conference told

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The trial of Adolf Eichmann and the Six Day War transformed German views of Jews, a conference has been told.

Prior to these events, the majority of Germans were largely silent about the Holocaust and usually regarded Jews as strangers and "schematic figures," said Michal Bodemann, a University of Toronto sociologist who has written about these themes.

Bodemann, a German-born academic, delivered his paper at a symposium on Jews and Germans sponsored by the Joseph and Gertie Schwartz Memorial Lectures.

The lectures took place under the auspices of the University of Toronto's faculty of arts and science and Jewish Studies program.

Speaking on the topic, Jews in German Eyes After the Holocaust, Bodemann exploded the myth that Germans were guilt-ridden, ashamed and sought dialogue with Jews in the immediate aftermath of World War II.

Right after the collapse of the Nazi regime, Germans tried to universalize the Holocaust, he noted.

Like Jews, they portrayed themselves as victims.

There was a strain of philo-Semitism in the wake of the war, he allowed. But for the most part, Germans perceived Jews in "extra-territorial terms," not as a people, but as individuals.

During the immediate postwar period when anti-Semitism reached virulent proportions, Jews were categorized stereotypically as "wise benefactors, noxious vermin or Orientals."

Using Die Zeit as a model of the liberal German press which sprang up after the war, Bodemann said that the newspaper carried very few stories about Jews from the late 1940s to the early 1950s, and only alluded to the Jewish background of prominent Jews.

But with the Eichmann trial and the Six Day War, German attitudes toward Jews underwent a radical transformation verging on philo-Semitism, Bodemann observed.

'Culture of memory' emerged after mid-1970s

Yet a "culture of memory" about Germany's Nazi past did not really emerge until after the mid-1970s, he said.

As this process occurred, Jews in Germany began to assert themselves publicly.

Derek Penslar, a University of Toronto history professor specializing in Jewish studies, said that the rabbinate and the Jewish press in imperial Germany depicted wealthy Jewish businessmen, such as the Rothschilds, in glowing terms.

"Pride of place went to the Jewish plutocracy."

However, some Jews claimed that the plutocrats' showy lifestyle and shady practices caused anti-Semitism, said Penslar, whose topic was Images of "Jewish Economic Man" in Imperial Germany.

Nevertheless, in the mid-18th century, the German middle class regarded Jews as allies against the nobility and the monarchy.

John Efron, an Indiana University history professor and a specialist in Jewish studies, discussed medicine and Jews during the Enlightenment. The topic of his lecture was Imagined Pathologies: Medicine and the Jews in the Age of Enlightenment.

Attempting to win emancipation for their fellow Jews, a number of Jewish doctors during this era urged their compatriots to improve their health and style of living.

These physicians, in what is now Germany and Poland, argued that Jews would upgrade their status in society through physical regeneration.

In fact, Efron said, Jews generally enjoyed better health and a longer life span than Christians from 1800 to 1900, as the Jewish population in Europe grew from two million to 11 million.

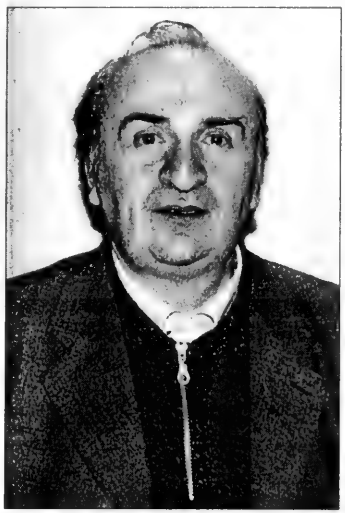
Exhibit portrays Renaissance Jewish history

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — At the height of the Italian Renaissance, Joshua Soncino was putting the final touches on his edition of the Hebrew Bible, Leonardo da Vinci was mastering the smile on the Mona Lisa, and Jews were being falsely accused of the murder of Simon from Trent.



Father Franco Bontempi

Today, Father Franco Bontempi, a professor of theology and a priest of the Catholic Church, says that the study of 15th-century Jewish culture can help us understand Renaissance artists such as Leonardo da Vinci, as well as assist us in overcoming centuries of anti-Semitism.

Father Bontempi, the author of Leonardo da Vinci and the Judaic Tradition and curator of an exhibit titled The Iron and Star: the Jewish Presence in Brescia during the Renaissance, was in Toronto recently to present lectures at York University and to promote his exhibit.

The exhibit features about 100 paintings, original manuscripts and photos that historically portray the economic and cultural life of the Jews in northern Italy, including the anti-Semitic events of those years.

In one of the more intense incidents portrayed in the exhibition, Jews were falsely arrested, tortured and executed for the murder of a Christian infant, Simon, in the city of Trent.

The portrayal of these incidents, Father Bontempi said, can help to overcome the anti-Semitism that has evolved in Europe over the centuries.

Many people seem to be wondering why Catholics have prepared this exhibition. For a long time, he said, "the preaching has been against Jews. Now it is difficult to present a new view of the problem."

It is easier for the higher levels of the Church to accept what we are doing, Father Bontempi said. Unfortunately, at the popular level, it is hard to overcome 2,000 years of anti-Semitism and polemics against the Jews.

"We are at the beginning of dialogue between the Christians and the Jews. Our exhibition is one tentative step to begin dialogue. The Christians are very suspicious. It isn't easy," he said.

In 1996, Father Bontempi brought the exhibit to Yeshiva University in New York, and then to the Italian Cultural Institute and the Bathurst Jewish Centre in Toronto.

"Initially," Father Bontempi said "the Jewish side was perplexed. However, Jewish scholars have since become very interested in our exhibition."

Father Bontempi also noted that it is important for students of Renaissance art to study Jewish culture if they want to truly understand the art of Leonardo and Rafaelo.

In his book, Leonardo da Vinci and the Judaic Tradition, Father Bontempi argues that da Vinci's art was affected by the Judaic tradition through the influences of Friar Amedeo Mendez da Silva.

According to Father Bontempi, Amedeo, who was initially a Marrano, wrote a manuscript titled Apocalypsis Nova, after he had become a friar in the Catholic Church. In that manuscript, Amedeo argues not only that Judaism and Christianity are of equal importance, but "that the essence [of religion] is to be found in the old law, while the new law only brings ancillary features."

This trend ran counter to the Christian thinkers of the time, Father Bontempi notes. The Church believed that Christianity superseded Judaism.

Father Bontempi writes that Leonardo was "the true interpreter of the Apocalypsis Nova, and that Amedeo's manuscripts allowed da Vinci "the opportunity to avail himself of...hidden meanings pointing to a reconciliation between the various faiths."

More and more students of the Renaissance are beginning to join us and study this very important period of Italian history, Father Bontempi said.

The exhibit is currently being displayed in St. Louis, Mo., and Bontempi is planning to show it in Venice in May, and in Montreal and Winnipeg sometime in the future.

Passover Food Ideas

For the family...

Holiday traditions live on

As we gather around the seder table this year, we will revel in the feeling of sharing the celebration with our family, some of whom we may be seeing for the first time in several months, or even years.

We will also cherish the memory of those no longer at the table, people who played a prominent part in Passovers past.

Our grandparents, beloved aunts and uncles or close friends, may not be with us physically, but their traditions live on and find their way into our Passover celebrations.

Serving eggs, celery or potatoes dipped in salt water, singing "Zayde's" Pesach song at the end of the seder meal, hiding the matzah in the same "hiding place," or having the most senior woman at the seder open the door for Elijah with the aid of small helpers, are traditions frequently passed on to us from previous generations. Grown children often do what their parents or grandparents did before them.

The Jewish people live on through other Jews, and as we retell the experience of the Exodus from Egypt, we are also passing down to our children traditions from our own Passover celebrations. They may not be as significant in the larger scheme of things, but they are cherished, nonetheless.

Few traditions influence our Passover celebrations more than the food we serve at the seder and throughout the week. If our grandmother's knaidlach were soft and fluffy, chances are our own chicken soup will be topped with fluffy matzah balls.

Current trends toward low fat, low sugar, high fibre and vegetarian dishes notwithstanding, during Passover, most of us still serve tzimmes made from our aunt's recipe, brisket the way our grandmother prepared it and fruit crisp just like our favourite family friend made it for years. Those who have shared their seder table with guests from other lands may incorporate new dishes into their own family traditions.

This year, CJN staff members offer their family recipes, dishes that have graced their Passover table for years. We bring them to you, not only so that you may start a new tradition, but to get you thinking about your previous Passover celebrations.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy the recipes, and chag kasher v'samayach.

Passover Food Ideas

Vegetarian solutions for Pesach dining

By EDITH ROTHSCHILD

Cooking for Passover presents a challenge to vegetarians. Grains and beans are not kosher for Pesach, neither is tofu. White sugar is a no-no because it is a refined food, suppresses our immune system, is addictive and has no nutritional value; a great potential to lead to disease with all its ramifications. By the same token, white sugar substitutes, such as maple syrup, brown syrup, and barley malt are not certified kosher for Pesach.

The only oils which are not a serious health-hazard are extra virgin olive oil for cooking, flaxseed oil for salads and the various other cold-pressed (or expeller-pressed) oils from a health food store, for baking. These oils are not available for Pesach, except extra virgin olive oil.

All other oils, which are sold in regular stores and supermarkets are bad for us because when heated they create free radicals, which attack our immune system by going after our good cells. Also, these oils are always rancid, which makes them carcinogenic, even though you won't taste it, because the manufacturer has masked the taste with chemical additives. Luckily, extra virgin olive oil is available with kosher-for-passover certification.

Our only option to overcome this week-long dilemma is to prepare as many vegetable dishes as our imaginations allow, eat a lot of fresh fruit desserts, substitute chametz food with kosher for Passover ingredients wherever necessary and, last but not least, ease up on any NO-FRY and NO-EGGS policy.

This is regardless of which oils we may choose. For example, you can buy sugar and walnut oil at some stores, as well as a large assortment of spices and herbs, which are COR certified kosher for Passover. A tremendous boon is QUINOA, which is permissible for Pesach when under supervision. It is a powerhouse of nutrients and considered a super grain because of its balanced protein properties and its easy digestibility. You can cook it in soups, eat it as you would eat hot cereal during the year and use it in a main course. (Cooks in 15-20 minutes).

FLOATING SOUP CLOUDS

This recipe is a welcome and elegant change from the traditional kneidel and is a lot friendlier to your stomach. You can add it to any soup.

2-4 eggs, separated
Salt to taste
1/4-1/2 tsp. paprika
Pinch of nutmeg
2 tbsp. fresh parsley or dill, chopped

Bring your soup to a boil.

Beat the egg whites until almost stiff. Add salt, paprika, nutmeg and continue beating until stiff but not dry. Gently fold in the yokes and parsley or dill by hand.

When soup has come to a rolling boil, pour the egg mixture over it and spread it out with a large spoon or spatula to cover all the soup like a blanket. Turn heat down to low, cover and simmer for 10 minutes.

Turn off heat. With a sharp knife, cut this cloud blanket into half on top of the soup, then quarters, and then into bite-size pieces. Serves 6-8.

Healthful Hint:

If you are on an egg-free diet, you do not need to use the yolks for this recipe, or use just one yolk for colour. When it is not Passover, you can add turmeric to this recipe for a richer colour, whether you use the yolks or not.

POTATO LEEK SOUP

This simple soup is filling and heart-friendly; truly nouvelle cuisine. Served cold, it becomes "Vichysoisse à la Cordon Bleu."

6 cups water
3 cups potatoes, peeled and cubed
3 cups leeks, carefully washed and sliced into 1 inch pieces
2 carrots, sliced into coins
2 cloves garlic, minced
1/2 tsp. dried marjoram
1/4 tsp. nutmeg
2 tbsp. fresh, chopped dill
Fresh parsley, chopped, for garnish

Place water, potatoes, leeks, carrots, and garlic into a saucepan, cover and bring to a boil. Simmer for about 25 minutes.

Drain vegetables through a sieve and place into food processor. Reserve the liquid.

Process in your processor, adding from the cooking liquid until the desired consistency. (Use leftover liquid as stock.)

Pour the soup back into the saucepan, add salt, nutmeg, marjoram and dill, adjust seasoning and simmer for another 10 minutes. Serves 6.

FRIED CAULIFLOWER

Mark Twain allegedly said: "Cauliflower is nothing but cabbage with a college education." So here's a sophisticated way to serve up the graduates.

1 medium cauliflower
Potato starch or matzah cake meal for dusting
Extra virgin olive oil for frying

Dredging Mixture
1/2 cup matzah meal
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. paprika
1/2 tsp. garlic powder
1/2 tsp. ginger
1/2 tsp. nutmeg

Separate cauliflower into florets so that you have about 25-30 pieces and wash. Steam florets for 4 minutes (not a second longer) and immediately rinse under running, cold water to stop the cooking process.

Shake each floret in potato starch or cake meal. Dip in the egg mixture and then in the dredging mixture.

Fry florets, some on 3 sides, until golden brown. Drain on paper towels.

To keep warm, place uncovered in a baking dish in a low oven. Yields: between 25-30 pieces.

Helpful Hint:

This recipe can be prepared a day in advance and reheated, uncovered in the oven.

MATZAH VEGGIE PIE

This is a great side dish to any yom tov meal. Leftovers taste delicious when broiled until sizzling.

3 medium potatoes, cooked and mashed (reserve the water for stock)
1 medium carrot, steamed whole and sliced into small cubes
1 cup mushrooms, sliced, packed tight
1 cup spinach, chopped, packed tight
½ cup onions, chopped
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
½ tsp. paprika
¼ tsp. nutmeg
½ tsp. ginger
¾ tsp. garlic powder
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil

Preheat oven to 350 degrees.

Break up the matzahs into 2-inch pieces, soak in a large bowl in warm water for 10 minutes and drain.

In a large pan, sauté the onions on a low flame until translucent. Add salt, pepper, paprika, nutmeg, ginger and garlic powder and stir well. Stir in the mushrooms and sauté 8 minutes. Add the spinach and sauté 3 minutes. Add the drained matzahs and stir everything together until thoroughly mixed.

Cool the mashed potatoes.

Transfer the matzah veggie mixture to a large mixing bowl, add the carrots, cooled mashed potatoes and eggs and mix thoroughly (best done with your glamorous ivory hands).

Pour into a greased 10-inch pie plate, straighten out the top with a spoon, bake for 40-50 minutes and serve immediately or, on yom tov, keep warm in a low oven, covered with foil. Serves 8-10.

Variation

This recipe can also be baked in a 9 x 9 square pan or, if you want to be decadent, it can be fried as patties or croquettes.

Submitting Passover recipes that have formed part of their family traditions was for most CJN staff members, a labour of love.

We offer you these recipes, and encourage you to reflect on your own family traditions.

TERRIFIC TZIMMES FOR PASSOVER

3 strips flanken
2 sliced onions
5 lbs. carrots sliced into coins
5 sweet potatoes cut into large chunks
1-1½ cups brown sugar
Salt to taste
Topping:
8 large potatoes
2 eggs or equivalent egg substitute
salt to taste
4 tbsp. oil

Cook meat and onions in large roaster, covered with water on top of stove for 1 hour. Add carrots. Cook covered for 1 hour. Add peeled sweet potatoes, salt and sugar. Bake in 350 oven for 1 hour.

Preheat oven to 350 and prepare potato topping. Peel and grate potatoes. Drain. Add salt, eggs and oil (should be like a potato kugel mixture). Spoon over tzimmes and bake 1½ hours until well browned.

If there are leftovers, just add a little bit of water before reheating.

From Gloria Clamen

MARGALIT'S OOJAH

2 lbs. cooked lamb cut in small pieces
8 eggs
½ cup or 4 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 cups chopped fresh parsley
½ tbsp. salt
3 cups water (more or less for desired consistency)
3 cups matzah meal

In Dutch oven or other-heavy frying pan with cover, cook lamb. Save liquid. In a large bowl, combine lamb in liquid, eggs, oil, parsley, salt and matzah meal. Let stand for about 20 minutes. Boil water, add to mixture and stir to paste-like consistency. Let stand 10 minutes. Preheat oven to 350. Grease a rectangular baking dish or pan. Bake until brown and puffy for about 1 hour. Serve hot with lemon slices.

From Anna Morgan

APRICOT AND CURRANT CHICKEN

2 chickens (2½-lbs. each) quartered
8 oz. dried apricots
8 oz. currants (raisins may be substituted)
1½ cup orange marmalade
⅓ cup apple juice
⅓ cup orange juice
¼ cup brown sugar

1 tsp. ground ginger
Salt and pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 375.

Place chicken pieces, skin side up, in shallow roasting pan and sprinkle generously with salt, pepper and then ginger.

Spread the marmalade over the chicken and put the apple and orange juice into the pan.

Bake 30 minutes.

Remove from oven and add the apricots and currants mixing the fruit evenly. Sprinkle the fruit with brown sugar and return to oven.

Bake 30-35 minutes, basting the chicken frequently, until the chicken is golden brown and shiny on top.

Remove the chicken, apricots and currants to a warmed serving platter. Put some of the pan juices over the top and pour the remaining juices into a sauceboat.

From Ella Burakowski

HONEYED SWEET POTATO CASSEROLE

4 medium sweet potatoes
1/2 cup honey or sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp salt
2 eggs lightly beaten
2 lbs. margarine
1/2 cup orange marmalade or pineapple jam

Peel and slice sweet potatoes and cook until tender. Mash in large bowl. Preheat oven to 350. Combine potatoes with all ingredients and mix well. Spread in a 1 quart greased casserole. Bake 30 to 40 minutes until lightly brown, and a cake tester comes out clean.

From Carolyn Blackman

PESACHDIK NOODLES FOR CHICKEN SOUP

2 tbsp. potato starch
1/2 cup lukewarm water
6 eggs
Pinch of salt
Oil to cover surface of frying pan

Dissolve starch in water. Let stand 10 minutes. Beat eggs and salt well. Add starch mixture to eggs. Beat well. Lightly oil surface of frying pan, and heat. Pour enough batter just to cover bottom of pan. Fry quickly over high heat (like crepes). Remove to plate when cooked, and repeat process until all batter is used. Only replenish oil if necessary. When cool, roll each "bletl" separately and slice approximately every 1/4 inch into noodles. Approx. 8 servings.

From Frances Kraft

PASSOVER BAGELS

1 cup water
1/2 cup oil
1 tsp. sugar
1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup matzah meal
3 eggs

Boil oil and water together. Add matzah meal, salt and sugar. Remove from heat. Stir until liquid is absorbed. Cover and let stand until cool. Add eggs one at a time. Beat until light and fluffy. Drop from spoon onto a lightly greased pan. Make a hole in centre of each one. Bake at 350 until brown, about 50 or 60 minutes.

From Carolyn Blackman

JEFF'S PASSOVER MUFFINS

Half the people in my family have food sensitivities. One of my sons can't eat oranges and is sensitive to most nuts. He also needs a low sugar diet and loves the bran muffins we make together all year. The following recipe is the result of our experiments to make something that looks and tastes sort of like "real" muffins.

1/4 cup ground almonds*
1/2 cup potato starch
3/4 cup cake meal
1/4 cup unsweetened dessicated coconut or other chopped nuts
1 egg
2 egg whites beaten until frothy but not stiff
1/3 cup oil
1/3 to 1/2 cup sugar
1 cup crushed pineapple in water or juice
1/4 cup matzah farfel softened in cold water and well drained
1/4 cup raisins or chocolate chips, or cut up dates (optional)

In medium bowl, mix together all dry ingredients; set aside.

In large bowl, mix together whole egg, oil and sugar until smooth and well mixed. Add beaten egg whites and mix. Add fruit and farfel and mix well.

Add dry ingredients; mix until just blended. Add raisins and mix gently. Spoon into paper-lined muffin pans. Bake at 350 for about 1/2 hour. Makes 10 to 12 muffins.

Notes: * You can use other nuts, but the nuts form part of the flour in the chametz recipe and need to be ground quite finely.

 You can use other fruit, such as grated apples or apple sauce. The sugar can be adjusted to taste and according to the sweetness of the fruit used.

PASSOVER APPLE CRISP

6 apples, pared and sliced
1/4 to 1/2 cup sugar (to taste)
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
2 tsp. lemon juice

Mix together and spread in an 8 or 9-inch baking pan.

Topping:
1/2 cup brown sugar (available for Passover in some stores, but you can use white sugar)
3/4 cup cake meal
1/8 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. pareve margarine
2 tbsp. oil
1/4 cup chopped nuts (almonds or walnuts work well)

Mix all ingredients together until crumbly. Spread over top of apples. Bake at 350 for about 1 hour.

The two above recipes from Carolan Halpern

Passover Food Ideas

Recipes designed to help you use up your chametz

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The following recipes will help you use up the chametz in your cupboards when you start to clean your kitchen for Passover.

MEXICAN CORN-BREAD PUDDING

3 cups dry corn bread
1¼ cups frozen corn kernels, thawed
1 cup chopped red bell pepper
2 cups coarsely grated kosher Monterey Jack cheese (about 8 ounces)
¾ cup thinly sliced scallion
Salt and pepper to taste
4 large eggs
2 10-oz. cans mild enchilada sauce
1¼ cups vegetable broth or pareve chicken broth

Crumble corn bread into 1-inch pieces and transfer to a large baking pan. Dry corn bread, uncovered, at room temperature 12 hours. (Alternatively, dry corn bread in a 250-degree oven for 1 hour.) Butter a 2-quart baking dish. Pat dry corn kernels. In a bowl, toss together corn bread, corn kernels, bell pepper, 1 cup cheese, scallion, salt and pepper. Transfer to baking dish.

In a bowl, whisk together eggs, enchilada sauce and broth and pour over corn-bread mixture. Sprinkle remaining cup of cheese evenly on top. Chill pudding, covered, at least 1 hour and up to 1 day. Preheat oven to 350. Bake pudding in middle of oven until bubbling, about 40 minutes. Serves 6 as a light main course or 8 to 10 as a side dish.

APPLE BREAD PUDDING

8 slices white bread, crusts trimmed
4 tsp. butter
3 medium apples, peeled, cored, cut into ½-inch wedges
8 tbsp. sugar
2 tbsp. dried currants or raisins
3 cups milk
3 large eggs
2 tsp. vanilla extract
½ tsp. ground cinnamon

Lightly butter 9 x 13-in. glass pie dish. Cut each bread slice into 4 squares. Arrange half of bread squares in single layer in prepared dish. Melt 2 tsp. butter in large non-stick skillet over medium heat. Add apples; sauté 5 minutes. Sprinkle with 2 tbsp. sugar; sauté until apples are golden, about 6 minutes. Arrange apples on top of bread in dish. Sprinkle with currants. Top with remaining bread squares in single layer.

Bring milk to simmer in small saucepan. Whisk eggs and remaining 6 tbsp. sugar in medium bowl to blend. Gradually whisk in hot milk, then vanilla and cinnamon. Pour over bread and apple mixture. Let stand until milk mixture is almost absorbed, occasionally pressing down on bread with spatula to submerge, about 30 minutes.

Preheat oven to 350. Place pie dish in roasting pan. Add enough hot water to roasting pan to come halfway up sides of pie dish. Bake bread pudding until top is golden and custard is set, about 40 minutes. Remove from water. Serve warm or at room temperature. Serves 6.

RICE SALAD WITH DILL AND BABY VEGETABLES

6 oz. baby carrots (about 20 to 22), trimmed, halved lengthwise
8 oz. baby zucchini, sliced into rounds
1½ cup cooked long-grain white rice
⅔ cup plain low-fat yogurt
3 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
2 tbsp. rice vinegar
1 tsp. olive oil
Fresh dill sprigs (optional)

Blanch carrots in large pot of boiling salted water 1 minute. Add zucchini and cook 1 minute. Using slotted spoon, transfer vegetables to colander. Rinse under cold water; drain well. Add rice to same pot of boiling water. Cook until tender, about 15 minutes. Drain. Rinse under cold water; drain well. Cool to room temperature.

Mix rice, carrots and zucchini in large bowl. Add yogurt, chopped dill, vinegar and oil. Toss to coat. Season to taste with salt and pepper. (Can be prepared 6 hours ahead. Cover and refrigerate.) Garnish with dill sprigs, if desired. Serves 4.

RICE, PINEAPPLE AND CHICKEN SALAD

2 tsp. plus 1 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. plus 2 tbsp. vegetable oil
4 tsp. minced garlic
4 tsp. minced peeled fresh ginger
12 oz. skinless boneless chicken breast halves, cut crosswise into ½-inch strips
2¼ cups water
1½ cups basmati rice or long-grain white rice
6 tbsp. fresh lime juice
1 cup cubed peeled pineapple
1 kiwi, peeled, cubed

Recipes to use up your chametz

¾ cup thinly sliced green onions
½ cup chopped red bell pepper
4 large curly lettuce leaves

Mix 2 tsp. soy sauce, 1 tsp. oil, 2 tsp. garlic and 1 tsp. ginger in medium bowl. Add chicken and toss to coat. Let stand 30 minutes. Meanwhile, bring 2¼ cups water to boil in heavy medium saucepan. Add rice; return to boil. Reduce heat to medium-low, cover and simmer until rice is tender and water is absorbed, about 15 minutes. Uncover; let stand until cool.

Sprinkle chicken with salt and pepper. Heat large non-stick skillet over high heat. Add chicken with marinade to skillet and sauté until golden brown and cooked through, about 4 minutes. Cool. Whisk lime juice, 1 tbsp. soy sauce, 2 tbsp. oil, 2 tsp. garlic and 3 tsp. ginger in large bowl. Mix in rice, chicken, pineapple, kiwi, ½ cup green onions and bell pepper. Season with salt and pepper. (Can be made 6 hours ahead.) Chill. Let stand up to 2 hours at room temperature before continuing. Line bowl with lettuce leaves. Spoon salad into bowl. Sprinkle with remaining ¼ cup green onions and serve. Serves 4.

DELUXE MACARONI AND CHEESE

2 cups small curd cottage cheese
1 cup sour cream
1 egg, lightly beaten
¾ tsp. salt
Garlic salt and pepper to taste
2 cups shredded sharp cheddar cheese
7-oz. pkg. elbow macaroni, cooked and drained
Paprika (optional)
Buttered bread crumbs

In a large bowl, combine the cottage cheese, sour cream, egg, salt, garlic salt and pepper. Add cheddar cheese; mix well. Add macaroni and stir until coated.

Transfer to a greased 2½-quart baking dish. Top with bread crumbs. Bake uncovered at 350 for 25-30 minutes or until heated through. Sprinkle with paprika if desired. Serves 8.

BROCCOLI, CHEESE, AND RICE CASSEROLE

1 cup instant rice, uncooked
½ cup onion, chopped
¼ cup skim milk
4 oz. light cheese, cubed
2 tbsp. margarine, softened
20 oz. chopped broccoli, thawed and drained
10-oz. tin cream of mushroom soup, undiluted

Preheat oven to 350. Combine all ingredients in a large bowl, and spoon into a 2-quart casserole. Bake at 350 for 45 minutes. Serves 8.

CHILI CHEESE CASSEROLE

4 eggs
¼ cup flour
½ tsp. baking powder
1½ tsp. dry mustard
1 cup cottage cheese
1 cup shredded Monterey Jack cheese
1 cup shredded cheddar cheese
3 chopped peeled green chilies
1 16-oz. package frozen hash browns
Shaker of paprika

Preheat oven to 325. Spray a small casserole dish, 7 or 8-in. square or round, with vegetable oil spray. Line the pan with ½-inch layer of potatoes. Beat eggs. Add dry ingredients and beat well. Blend in remaining ingredients except for paprika. Batter will be lumpy. Pour in dish and bake 25-30 minutes. Shake top with paprika. Serves 4.

MEXICAN MACARONI

8 oz. macaroni
1 14.5-oz. can Mexican-style tomatoes, undrained and chopped
1 can cream of mushrooms soup
8 oz. sour cream
1 4.5-oz. can chopped green chilies or jalapenos
1 cup shredded Monterey Jack cheese
1 cup shredded Cheddar cheese

Cook macaroni according to package directions; drain. Combine macaroni, tomatoes, soup, sour cream, and chilies; stir in half of cheeses. Pour into a lightly greased 2-quart baking dish; top with remaining cheeses. Bake at 350° for 30 minutes. Serves 4.

ROASTED VEGETABLES PASTA AND CHEESE

3 cups eggplant, peeled and diced, about ¾ pound
1 cup red bell pepper, coarsely chopped
1 cup yellow bell pepper, coarsely chopped
1 cup onion, coarsely chopped
1 medium zucchini, quartered lengthwise and sliced
2 tsp. olive oil
4 cloves garlic, minced
½ cup all-purpose flour
2¼ cups milk
¾ cup mozzarella cheese, shredded
¾ cup Parmesan cheese, grated, divided
¼ tsp.salt
¼ tsp. ground pepper
6 cups rotini or shell or macaroni pasta, cooked
Dash paprika

Preheat oven to 450. Combine vegetables, oil and garlic in a large shallow roasting pan; toss well. Bake at 450 for 30 minutes or until lightly browned, stirring occasionally. Remove from oven; set aside. Reduce oven temperature to 375.

Place flour in a large saucepan. Gradually add milk, stirring until well blended. Cook over medium heat 8 minutes or until thick, stirring constantly. Add mozzarella cheese, ½ cup Parmesan cheese, salt, pepper; cook 3 minutes or until cheese melts, stirring frequently. Remove from heat; stir in roasted vegetables and macaroni.

Spoon mixture into a 3-quart casserole coated with cooking spray. Combine remaining ¼ cup Parmesan cheese and paprika, and sprinkle over macaroni mixture. Bake 375 for 20 minutes or until bubbly.

Academics, students concerned about plan to tie funding to job rate

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Basing university funding on rates of employment among graduates is very short-sighted, says Adele Reinhartz, a professor in the department of religious studies at McMaster University.

"It implies that the only reason for going to university and the only valid performance outcome is measured by whether a person is employed within a certain period of time," she said.

On March 14, Dianne Cunningham, minister of training, colleges and universities, announced a $52-million increase in university and college operating grants. Of this increase, $16.5 million will be tied to the total number of graduates, and to graduate rates of employment after six months and after two years.

"We are fulfilling our commitment to reward schools that do the best job of preparing students to succeed after graduation," said Cunningham in a ministry release.

But this announcement has some academics and students worried.

"People getting a degree in Jewish studies are not going to be immediately employable," said David Novak, the J. Richard and Dorothy Shiff chair of Jewish studies at The University of Toronto.

The U of T offers a major and a minor in Jewish studies.

"This type of thinking is not going to be good for the humanities, and Jewish studies is part of the humanities," Novak said.

He added that the government's initiative could "turn all of our universities into trade schools."

Jeremy Shimkofsky, a second-year history major at Wilfrid Laurier University shares this concern.

"More money will go into engineering and computer science. The traditional arts and humanities that people used to go to university for are going to be neglected," said Shimkofsky, president of the Waterloo-Laurier Jewish Students Association.

Michael Brown, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, believes his university's Jewish teacher education program will not be affected, because the program teaches people a skill and many graduates go right into a job. But the Jewish studies program may be affected, he said.

"If the thrust of government policy is going to be to encourage people in skills training programs... then certainly Jewish studies will be adversely affected," he said.

Dave Rose, spokesperson for the Ministry of Training, Colleges and Universities, says there is more student demand for technology-based programs anyway.

While there are three times more spaces in Ontario universities and colleges for arts programs than for programs like computer science and engineering, student applications for arts programs are down, and applications for computer science and engineering are up, he said.

Bob Rosehart, president of Wilfrid Laurier University, says the funding announcement is good news for the university. He points out that in the Ontario University Graduate Survey, which polled Ontario graduates from the class of 1996, Laurier graduates had the highest rate of employment after six months and after two years.

Under the government's grant system, "you don't have to be the biggest university to do well," he said.

York University is studying how the announcement will affect the university's academic plans, said Sine MacKinnon, a spokesperson for York.

But Jeremy Zacks, president of the Jewish Students Federation at York University, said that rather than spending its money discovering which university students are getting jobs, the government should be using its funds for worthier causes – like solving the problem of student debt.

USDS REACHES OUT: The students of USDS Richmond Hill campus recently prepared cards that have been sent to Circle of Care to be inserted in their Meals on Wheels. By reaching out to the elderly and infirm, the school is promoting the program of G'millut Chassadim in a meaningful way. Seen (from left) are Lauren Weinberg, Emilee Isen and Deborah Grossman.

Coast to Coast

New, interesting developments

Simply skimming over the headlines, one could be forgiven for thinking that not much is happening in the nation's capital...well, nothing new at any rate.

Chrétien and Martin are still fencing – or at least their respective lieutenants are, despite the Prime Minister's convincing victory at the Liberal party convention last weekend.

The HRDC scandal plods along with lesser or greater revelations every couple of days. The "New Right" is gearing up for a leadership race and announcements of who's supporting whom pepper the political pages of our newspapers a couple of times a week.

However, if one looks below the surface, there are some developments that are of particular interest to the Jewish community.

A couple of months after Robert Rabinovitch was appointed as chair of the CBC, his younger – and equally talented – brother, Victor, has just been appointed CEO of the Museum of Civilization.

Victor Rabinovitch earned the highest praise from the cultural and arts communities while he served under Sheila Copps at Heritage Canada and his appointment as head of the beleaguered museum has been welcomed.

Not as well known, is that the Museum of Civilization also controls the National War Museum – which was just promised almost $85 million worth of grants from the federal government. In the context of the heated battles about a dedicated Holocaust museum, Rabinovitch's presence will go far in securing a wise compromise between the War museum purists (the various veterans organizations) and the Jewish community.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

One word of caution! Organizations like Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith had better not make assumptions about how easy a sell Rabinovitch will be on this issue. His overall perspective is rooted in ideas like inclusiveness. He will resist any proposals that lead to "exclusiveness" and special treatment.

Another development to watch is that of Stockwell Day. He is the Alberta treasurer running against Preston Manning for the leadership of the yet-to-be formed Canadian Alliance. One of the inroads this new party will have to make in order to break through in Ontario is to the Jewish community. Day's evangelical background is far more pronounced than that of Manning. The CJC and B'nai Brith ought to be exploring this issue and sharing their insights with their constituencies.

War veterans maintain their post

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

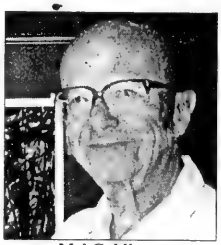
OTTAWA – A dedicated and active group of Jewish war veterans continues to put the Ottawa Post of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, on the map.

At an age when many men and women would prefer to relax and, perhaps, forget about the past, the members of the Ottawa Post continue their work preserving the memory of World War II.

The Ottawa Post was founded some 10 years ago, with many members who were more than 60 years old at the time. There are approximately 120 active veterans involved right now.

According to Commander Mel Goldberg, the purpose of the post is "to keep alive the spirit that was engendered during the war, the strong feeling of Jewish fellowship among the men.

"The reason the men joined here in Ottawa was out of strong patriotism, to bring the history of the past into the life of the present so we don't forget our heritage, what we fought for and what we hope to retain in our Jewish community."



Mel Goldberg

This year has been particularly momentous for the Ottawa Post: it launched a book entitled THERE I WAS...A Collection of Reminiscences by Members of the Ottawa Jewish Community who served in World War II.

Taking an idea from Freda Lithwick who had served with the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, a core group of veterans including Mort Baslaw, Morrie Konick, Cy Torontow and the late Elliott Gluck produced a volume which vividly describes the adventures and misadventures of the Ottawa soldiers.

Baslaw, who was responsible for the design and layout of the book, says, "The second generation after the war has little or no interest in what happened."

He says the stories are one way to bring history to life, and he wants people to understand how many Jewish men and women enlisted to serve their country.

"On a per capita basis," he notes, there were more Jewish volunteers from Ottawa "for the army, navy and air force than anywhere [else] in Canada."

According to local records, 52 of the 417 Ottawa Jews who served were killed. "Our children and grandchildren are living in peace," says Baslaw, "and that makes it worthwhile."

The usual activities of the Ottawa Post include an annual spring banquet with prominent speakers, and the presentation of two annual awards to young people who have shown leadership and made contributions to their community

The guest speaker at last year's banquet was Jack Granatstein, director and CEO of the Canadian War Museum. He wrote the foreword to THERE I WAS.

Granatstein says the book has "pathos and humour, the bald record of death and suffering, the story of triumph and victory. Read it and weep; read it and be proud."

PURIM FUN: Jordana Rosen, as Queen Esther, created her own crown at a Purim party, sponsored by Shaar Shalom Synagogue's youth department.

Quebec drug plan called disaster for poor elderly

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec's drug insurance plan has been a disaster for the impoverished elderly, forcing many of them to choose between buying food or buying the medications they need, according to representatives of the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors.

In a presentation to the National Assembly commission studying the plan, the representatives of the centre (the merged Golden Age Association and Jewish Support Services for the Elderly) said they see, daily, among many of its 7,000 members, financial and health hardships created by the three-year-old drug plan.

According to the centre's statistics, 31.3 percent of the Montreal Jewish elderly are poor.

In the brief that accompanied the presentation, the centre charged that the plan is "an attack against the most disadvantaged persons in our society."

The government's main reason for instituting it was to save the cost of subsidizing free or almost free drugs for seniors and welfare recipients, rather than safeguarding the public's health, the brief said.

The plan eliminated the nominal $2 charge per prescription, to a $100 maximum per year, for those over 65. Even low-income seniors receiving the partial old age pension supplement can now pay up to $675 a year for medication.

Health Minister Pauline Marois has suggested that the annual $175 premium paid by all but the poorest Quebecers may have to be more than doubled because the plan is in serious debt.

The centre says prescription drugs should be free for all persons living below the poverty line as defined by Statistics Canada. Currently, the premium is only waived for those with an income under $10,400 for single persons.

In the case of seniors with the lowest income, those receiving the full supplement, they, like everyone, must pay the first $8.33 of the cost of a prescription, up to a monthly maximum of $16.67 and a yearly maximum of $200.

The hardest hit, though, are those seniors whose incomes are somewhat above that, said Benita Goldin, a centre co-ordinator.

Those receiving the partial supplement are responsible for the full $175 premium if they make $14,776 or more ($25,651 or more for a couple). They are also responsible for the $8.33 deductible up to $41.67 a month, and anywhere from $500-$675 annually.

In even worse circumstances are those who do not get the partial supplement, but whose income from other sources is about the same, Goldin said. Under the system now, these seniors are categorized the same way as younger adults.

This means their monthly maximum contribution is $62.50 and, for the year, they could pay between $750-$925, Goldin said.

"The manner in which individuals are assessed is unfair. It should not be based on the pension category of the individual, but on the total income," she said.

In addition, the plan does not cover all drugs, she pointed out. Notable among these as far as the elderly are concerned is Arisept, which slows the progression of Alzheimer's disease.

The delegation, which also included volunteers Evelyn Sacks and J.D. Zingboim, stressed to the commission that the government should take seriously the evidence that many impoverished seniors are cutting back on essentials like food or, if they are a little better off, no longer doing the little things that enhance their quality of life or decrease social isolation so that they will have money for the plan.

Others are not taking their medications and become sick, or even die, as a result.

Some turn to relatives or community organizations to help them pay for their prescriptions, which is humiliating and is a burden on charities, they said.

The centre is subsidizing the drug costs of about 100 clients, up to $200 a year, at present and the demand for assistance is increasing.

Another problem is the shift to shorter hospital stays. Discharged patients have to assume the costs of the drugs they would have received free in hospital, the centre notes.

The centre called for the government to fund the drug insurance plan like any other social program. The plan should be regarded as an integral part of the health-care system, entirely public and universal, according to the centre.

The centre also urged the development of a global policy on drugs that would examine how the medical profession makes prescriptions and the role played by the pharmaceutical companies in determining cost.

Hate promotion charges dismissed

TORONTO – An Ontario judge has thrown out hate promotion charges against four adults and two youths after he ruled the Crown failed to show that Roma and Gypsy are one and the same.

The six skinheads had been charged with promoting hatred against Roma following a demonstration outside a Scarborough motel in 1997. They carried signs that said "Honk if you hate Gypsies" and "Canada is not a trash can."

Judge Russell Otter ruled the Crown failed to show that Roma and Gypsies are interchangeable terms. He rejected a Crown request that came late in the trial to take judicial notice that the two are the same. During the trial, Crown attorney Maggie Lazaridis argued that Gypsy was a pejorative form for Roma. She said the Crown is considering an appeal.

Insurance policies of Holocaust victims to be settled

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF

MONTREAL — Countless Holocaust survivors, their heirs and heirs of Holocaust victims may be eligible for insurance claims that have not been honoured from policies taken out by European Jews between 1920 and 1945, says Neal Sher.

The Washington-based Sher, who is chief of staff of the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims (ICHEIC), is also a special advisor to the War Crimes Unit of the Canadian Department of Justice.

Sher recently spoke at Congregation Shomrim Laboker at a public meeting on Holocaust-era insurance claims, which was organized by the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada.

The ICHEIC was established in late 1998 by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, the umbrella group of insurance regulators from all 50 U.S. states, with the participation of a number of major Jewish organizations and the State of Israel. The president of the commission is Lawrence Eagleburger, a former American secretary of state.

Thus far, five major European insurance companies – Allianz AG, AXA, Generalie, Winterthur, and Zurich Allied – who held policies of Holocaust victims and survivors, have agreed to co-operate with the ICHEIC in settling the claims.

Sher said other companies are also being pressured to co-operate in this major, worldwide effort. Both the U.S. State Department and the American Congress are helping to exert pressure on the other insurance companies.

One reason the companies are co-operating is that many of them have American subsidiaries that could be susceptible to U.S. government pressure.

Sher said that a number of types of policies, including life and dowry insurance and annuity policies, were purchased by European Jews in the decades before the Holocaust and most of them have not been honoured.

In co-operation with the insurance companies, the ICHEIC has established "relaxed standards of proof" needed to settle claims. Sher said that in some cases, "anecdotal memories" may themselves be enough to establish a sufficient level of evidence to justify claims.

He said that in response to claims, the co-operating companies are searching their files for any evidence of a policy. As well, ICHEIC archivists are searching records in countries including Germany, Poland, Austria and the Czech Republic for the names of policy holders.

Already, Sher said, tens of thousands of names have been found and will soon be posted on ICHEIC's Web site, with more to come.

"Anyone who has any reason to believe that they had an insurance policy, or that they are an heir to someone who may have had a policy, should file a claim with the ICHEIC," said Sher.

"With inflation and interest, policies should be worth about 10 times their prewar value," he added.

Sher also explained that a "humanitarian fund" has been established for claims against insurance companies that may no longer exist.

In response to critics who suggest that it is ignoble to talk about monetary settlements for Holocaust victims, Sher agreed that no amount of money will ever buy justice, but emphatically stated that not to demand what is owed is to accept second-class citizenship.

Sher asked the audience to help spread the word to all survivors and heirs of victims so that they can take advantage of the ICHEIC's claims procedures. There is no charge for the ICHEIC's services and their forms and documentation are available in many languages. The deadline to submit a claim to be pursued by ICHEIC is Feb. 15, 2002.

The ICHEIC has established toll-free numbers to call for information and claim forms. For information in English, call 1-800-496-1974. In French, call 1-800-498-2091.

Kosher bakeries hit by public health blitz

COR is taking a "proactive approach" to the situation, he said. New supervision contracts, and addenda to existing ones, will stipulate that the hechsher is subject to revocation if an establishment is found in violation of health codes.

If the hechsher is revoked because of a public health violation, it will be reissued "when the government is satisfied that the violations have been fixed," he said.

Rabbi Levin stressed that the contracts now in force insist that every establishment under COR supervision must be in compliance with government requirements.

Reg Ayre, supervisor of health inspectors for the former city of Toronto, said that inspections are done on either a routine basis or after a complaint.

He did not know what precipitated the inspection of the two bakeries this time. The inspector may have gone in just because he or she was in the area, and they were scheduled for inspection in any event.

He explained that among the things inspectors look for are unsanitary practices and equipment, structural problems in the premises (for instance, if a ceiling has had water damage, flakes of plaster might be falling into the food), or insect or rodent infestation.

Animal infestation, Ayre said, is grounds for automatic and immediate closure.

Sam Meller, owner of Carmel, told The CJN that he was anxious to give his side of the story. "The truth is always better than wild rumours," he said.

The bakery had been inspected in January, he said. He was told that some of the machinery needed cleaning, which was done.

A week later, he received conditional approval to carry on. "The inspector said that he was not comfortable with the floor, the walls or the ceiling.

"I had a written understanding that everything would be fixed when we close for Pesach."

When the inspector came during the current blitz, "he found one cockroach stuck in a glue trap, and thought he saw another one in an area not used for food. He also saw a live mouse."

Meller noted that "the inspector felt he had no choice except to close us down and insist that everything had to be fixed."

The inspector stressed that he was not condemning the baked goods as being contaminated, said Meller. "He allowed us to sell or ship whatever was on the shelf at that time."

Meller said that he has had the exterminators in three times this month, and has installed a series of mouse and roach traps.

However, he said, "every bakery is an attractive environment for rodents and insects, because of the flour, the sesame and poppy seeds, and the moisture."

The bakery, including the machinery, is being thoroughly cleaned, fixed where necessary, and painted, he said.

"The crews are working 24 hours a day," Meller said. "It will be virtually a new bakery."

Canada's media garner honours for fighting racism

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Avi Lewis, the host of CBC Newsworld's debate show, CounterSpin, was the keynote speaker at the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights 25th annual National Media Human Rights Awards Dinner which was held recently.

"I am happy to be here to salute the human rights awards," said Lewis, who is the son of former Ontario NDP leader and Canadian UN ambassador Stephen Lewis, and grandson of former national NDP leader David Lewis.

"Fighting racism in Canada is still a full time job," he noted, citing recent allegations of racist treatment of native peoples by police officers in Saskatoon.

Much of his presentation was a discussion of the world's new seeming willingness to become involved in "humanitarian intervention," as evidenced in Kosovo and East Timor last year, as compared to the old position that the internal affairs of individual countries were no one else's business.

He pointed out that it ain't necessarily so. The United States and other countries seem only to be willing to intervene in situations where there are strategic considerations and there is little or no risk to the lives of their soldiers.

This year, the League for Human Rights introduced a new category, the World Wide Web, in its media awards. Accepting the award in the category was former Winnipegger and Torontonian Hersh Jacob on behalf of his journalism students at Loyalist College in Belleville, Ont.

> 'Fighting racism is still a full time job'

Under his tutelage, the students have created www.thepioneer.com, a Web page dedicated to informing the public about atrocities committed against children all over the world.

Jacob has had a varied career. He left Winnipeg for Toronto 25 years ago and has been involved in theatre and theatre design, publishing and journalism. He moved to the Kingston, Ont. area two years ago. In addition to teaching at the college, he is currently working on a book with noted Winnipeg author, Sheldon Oberman.

The Winnipeg Free Press and reporter Dan Lett were the winners in the Print Dailies category with a report on the plight of foreign doctors unable to work in Manitoba – and across Canada – because of their inability to get proper training. At the same time, provinces are short of doctors and have been bringing in physicians mainly from South Africa. A second story by Lett and the Free Press on the causes of wrongful convictions earned an Honourable Mention.

The winner in the Print Non Dailies category was the Saanich News for a series of articles countering Holocaust denial. CBC/Foundation of Independent Living got the nod in the Television category for the series' portrayal of people living with disabilities. A CBC Radio One program on the Mikmaq People of the Maritimes won for radio.

The climax of the evening was a special human rights award presentation to Hersch Zentner. The retired Winnipeg teacher has dedicated the last 12 years of his life to teaching Manitoba students about the Holocaust.

"I accept this award with honour and deep humility," he said. "I dedicate it to all the victims of the Holocaust and racism."

His career as a Holocaust and anti-racist educator began in 1988 with his participation in the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada's Holocaust and Hope educators' study tour of the death camps of Poland.

"It was a hot summer day," he recalls. "I walked out of the crematorium in Maidanek and wandered around in a daze. I couldn't imagine how this kind of thing could be allowed to occur. At Birkenau, I picked up some ashes and said Kaddish. I resolved to do whatever I could to prevent this from happening to anyone ever again."

Zentner was a Winnipeg teacher for 28 years. He is a long-standing member of the Holocaust Awareness Committee of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg. At one point, he was doing up to 70 presentations a year in schools in Winnipeg and rural Manitoba on the Holocaust and racism. For health reasons, he has had to cut back in recent years.

"I asked a friend in New York why he teaches about the Holocaust," Zentner recounted. "His reply was that he wanted to burn the lessons into complacent souls and scar them for life. Hatred hasn't gone away. Only the target has changed. Survivors say that the only hope for the future is education. Not much else seems to matter."

Clinton reported gloomy after 'harsh' exchange

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GENEVA — Describing last Sunday's summit between U.S. President Bill Clinton and Syrian President Hafez al-Assad as "useful," White House Press Secretary Joe Lockhart did his best to put a brave face on the disappointing finish to the encounter at a post-summit press conference.

Lockhart told reporters that he was unable to report "a narrowing of differences" between the Israeli and Syrian positions, and that the gaps were at present too great for the U.S. to believe that an immediate resumption of talks "would be productive."

Parties to the talks had built up the summit as a fateful crossroads where the future of the Syrian track would be decided, Lockhart said. However, despite the disappointment, the U.S. vowed to continue working with the parties, and that both sides had "expressed the desire to stick with it."

The talks started late, in order to give Clinton a chance to recuperate after his arrival from a gruelling tour of South Asia, but once under way, the two leaders spoke for about two hours before taking a break.

When they resumed it was unclear how long it would last, with one U.S. delegation member saying that, "if necessary, they'll talk all night."

But the second round of talks ended after just over one half hour, and a Geneva airport spokesperson subsequently said that both leaders' aircraft were being readied for their return journeys.

Although Lockhart reported that the Syrian President had expressed himself "clearly and forcefully," sources in Clinton's entourage said that the tone of the conversation had been harsh, and that the president had left the summit in a gloomy mood.

Clinton spoke to Barak by telephone shortly before his meeting with Assad, and was said to be planning to contact him late last night to inform him of the Syrian rejection of the latest Israeli proposal.

Syrian officials had been expressing optimism for a resumption of the peace talks, in part due simply to the fact that the 69-year-old Assad, who rarely ventures abroad, had consented to make the trip to Switzerland to see Clinton.

But in the hours before the meeting, all sides tried to downplay expectations. U.S. national security adviser, Sandy Berger, claimed that the differences between the two sides may well be irreconcilable, and when asked whether the summit would lead to an immediate renewal of the talks, he told reporters "I don't think that is a likely outcome." He also quoted President Clinton as having told Omani Sultan Qabus the night before the summit that "the gaps are not huge, but the path is very difficult."

According to a high-level U.S. official, who requested anonymity, the two leaders were supposed to discuss five main problems, which have until now proved intractable: an exact boundary demarcation after an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights; an alternative security arrangement that does not include an Israeli presence on the Golan; the exact nature of the peace being sought by both sides; the timetable for achieving it, and confidence-building measures.

At present, it is hard to predict how the negotiations will recover from what a senior U.S. source referred to as "a hard blow." Lockhart told reporters that the next step would be special envoy Dennis Ross's visit to Israel, but declined to elaborate.

Originally, there had been plans for U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to fly directly to the Middle East – from Geneva – if the summit succeeded. Now, with only Ross coming, it is clear the summit failed to reach the breakthrough long expected.

Lebanese paper wants Syria out

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A Beirut newspaper has broken a major taboo by demanding that Syria create a timetable for withdrawing its 35,000 troops from Lebanon.

The front-page article in An-Nahar, described by Arab sources as "unprecedented" and "audacious," was published on the eve of President Clinton's meeting in Geneva on Sunday with Syrian President Hafez al-Assad.

It is thought to be a message to the two leaders that Assad cannot be rewarded with continued Syrian control over Lebanon in exchange for resuming negotiations with Israel.

The call – in the form of an open letter to Assad's son and heir-apparent, Bashar – was written and signed by Gebran Tueni, managing director and chair of the board of the newspaper.

"I have to tell you quite frankly: Many Lebanese consider that Syria's behaviour in Lebanon completely contradicts the principles of sovereignty, dignity and independence," wrote Tueni.

"Syria's presence in Lebanon has never meant anything more than periodic military and political disputes. Our only knowledge of Syrian policies came from the political elite that Syria helped install in power, and which did more to distort these policies than serve them.

"You must also undoubtedly realize that the Lebanese are utterly devoted to their dignity, liberty, independence and sovereignty, and that they are understandably angered when they feel that 'Syrian behaviour' threatens those values."

He asserted that "Syria needs Lebanon as much as Lebanon needs Syria – if both of us want to face the future together after peace is established, and not to pay its price.

"That is why we say that a healthy and strong Lebanon will bolster Syria's position.

"Therefore," he continued, "we demand that Lebanon be made a full partner – and not just a mere stooge – in order that we may face Israel together."

Tueni said he was addressing the "open letter" to Bashar because he represents "a new, youthful and forward-looking generation, a generation that might someday have to shoulder the responsibility of building Syria's future."

He wrote: "The people are asking for a timetable for Syrian redeployment and are waiting for answers. Those asking for this redeployment are neither traitors nor enemies but persecuted citizens who want answers that will dispel their justifiable fears."

The note left behind

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Pope John Paul II crowned his pilgrimage to Israel last week with a significant gesture to the Jewish people.

On a visit to the Western Wall, the Pope put into the Kotel a note asking forgiveness for historic Christian mistreatment of Jews.

Typed onto an ivory card with the Vatican's emblem, his message read:

God of our fathers,
You chose Abraham and his descendants
To bring your Name to the Nations:
We are deeply saddened
By the behaviour of those
Who in the course of history
Have caused these children of Yours to suffer,
And asking your forgiveness
We wish to commit ourselves
To genuine brotherhood
With the people of the Covenant.
Jerusalem 26 March 2000 (cq)

The Pope's signature was at the bottom of the card.

The note did not stay in the Kotel very long. Government Press Office spokesperson Moshe Fogel, in a reflection of the importance Israel placed on the Pope's act of contrition, took the note and gave it to Yad Vashem.

The note was not meant to stay in the Wall, Yad Vashem spokesperson Lisa Davidson told The CJN. She said this acquisition is "very important" for the archives and library building, where the note will be put on display.

Fogel said he wanted the Pope's letter to be put on display for all to see rather being swept away by the wind.

The Pope, leader of the world's one billion Roman Catholics, ended his week-long pilgrimage with a spiritual tour of Jerusalem's most sacred sites for Jews, Muslims and Christians.

'Never again': Pope at Yad Vashem

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Pursuing the dual themes of reconciliation and respect for human dignity that infused his remarks during his visit to Israel, Pope John Paul II last week declared that the central lesson of the Holocaust is "to ensure that never again will evil prevail, as it did for the millions of innocent victims of Nazism."

Although expectations had run high that the Pope would take advantage of his historic visit to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial to apologize for the silence of the Catholic Church during the Holocaust, he instead delivered a more universal message.

The pontiff, the first ever to visit Yad Vashem, paid homage to the Jewish victims of Nazism, and said he himself carried "personal memories" of Nazi-occupied Poland, where he grew up.

"As Bishop of Rome and successor to the Apostle Peter, I assure the Jewish people that the Catholic Church is deeply saddened by the hatred, acts of persecution and displays of anti-Semitism directed against the Jews by Christians at any time and in any place," the Pope said.

He stressed that the extermination of a whole people could only have been carried out by "godless" Nazis, not Christians.

He said it was his prayer that "our sorrow for the tragedy which the Jewish people suffered in the 20th century will lead to a new relationship between Christians and Jews."

His expressions of regret failed to satisfy many Israelis and observers abroad, who sought an outright apology for the alleged inaction of the wartime pope, Pius XII, during the Holocaust.

Said B'nai Brith Canada president Lawrence Hart: "Pope John Paul has in the past spoken of the 'errors and failures' of the sons and daughters of the Church during the Holocaust. However, we cannot accept that the followers of the Church should alone bear a burden of responsibility that belongs to the moral leadership of the time.

"On the historic occasion of His Holiness' visit to Yad Vashem, we feel that an important opportunity has been missed to focus on the wartime pontiff's failure to provide that moral leadership."

Others welcomed John Paul's comments.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen said the Pope's Yad Vashem remarks were "an historic moment in the reconciliation of the Catholic Church and the Jewish people. This Pope has gone further than his predecessors in recognizing the Jewish roots of Catholicism, in deploring all acts of anti-Semitism and racism and in expressing profound sadness for the fate of the Jews in the Holocaust.

"These gestures show a sensitivity to the fate of the Jews which surpasses by far any previous moves by other Church leaders and lays a firm foundation for future generations of Jews and Catholics to build on," Ronen stated. "We do not see this as the end, but as a new beginning."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa, chair of CJC's religious and interreligious affairs committee added, "This magnificent statement must be appreciated for what it is. It was perhaps impossible for the Pope to meet all expectations in one moment. No doubt some will be disappointed that he did not explicitly apologize for the role of the official church during the Holocaust. But on the whole, the Pope has reached out to Jews as fellow human beings, in a fashion that would have been unheard of in the past.

"We must move on. We have a solid relationship. It is on this ground that any disagreements of the future will be tested," Rabbi Bulka said.

"I have every confidence that our dialogue with the Catholics will strengthen us both."

Prior to his visit to Yad Vashem, held on the fourth day of his Mideast trip, the Pope met with Israel's Sephardi and Ashkenazi chief rabbis.

Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau said after the meeting that he and his Sephardi counterpart, Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, had asked the Pope to "sharpen" the Church's repentance for its silence during the Holocaust.

They also asked for his intervention with the Iranian authorities in regard to the 13 Jews who await trial in Iran, 10 of whom are in prison on charges of espionage.

During the ceremony, held in Yad Vashem's Hall of Remembrance, a stark structure where the names of the death camps are engraved on the floor, the Pope rekindled the eternal flame – its smoke wafting out of an opening in the ceiling, eerily reminiscent of Nazi crematoria – and placed a wreath on a slab under which are buried the ashes of Jews from six of the death camps.

He also shook hands with six survivors representing the six million Jewish victims of the Nazis. One of them, Edith Tzirer, wept as she told the Pope how he had saved her in 1945, while he was still a seminarian, by giving her food and carrying her on his back for three kilometres when she had no strength.

At the end of the ceremony, the Pope had an emotional reunion with Jewish residents of his hometown of Wadowice who survived the Holocaust, most of whom live in Israel.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak delivered a forceful speech at the ceremony, recalling that his maternal grandparents, who lived in Warsaw, had perished in the Holocaust.

Addressing the Pope, Barak stated: "You have done more than anyone else to bring about the historic change in the attitude of the Church toward the Jewish people… and to dress the gaping wounds that festered."

The only jarring note of the day came in the afternoon at an interfaith gathering at Notre Dame Hospice across from the Old City of Jerusalem.

Rabbi Lau was heckled when he suggested that the Pope's pilgrimage to the Jewish state was tantamount to his "recognition of Jerusalem as [Israel's] united, eternal capital city."

Sheikh Taysir al-Tamimi, head of the Palestinian Authority's Sharia (Muslim law) court, stoked passions further by rattling off a list of injustices committed against the Palestinians by Israel and demanding a "just peace" that will "create an independent [Palestinian] state on national land…with Jerusalem as its eternal capital."

He then left the gathering before the ceremonial planting of an olive tree.

March 20

• Israel welcomed U.S. President Bill Clinton's announcement that he plans to meet soon with Syrian President Hafez al-Assad in Geneva.

• The High Court ruled that, in keeping with Vatican policy, the Star of David should be removed from the ambulance accompanying Pope John Paul II during his visit to Israel.

March 21

• Three Israelis were wounded, one of them seriously, when gunmen opened fire on their car near Hebron. Not long after, a Palestinian woman was killed and her husband wounded when Israeli troops fired on their car for trying to run a roadblock.

March 22

• Israel protested to UN Secretary General Kofi Annan over what it called a recent "alarming campaign of anti-Israel incitement" in some Arab countries. "This propaganda campaign knows no bounds," Israel's UN ambassador, Yehuda Lancry, said in a letter to Annan.

March 23

• Israel and Syria are close to an agreement, as a result of a series of secret contacts, Egypt's president Hosni Mubarak told the Washington Post.

March 24

• Early elections may be called if no solution is found to keep both Shas and Meretz in the government's coalition, sources close to the prime minister said. The current controversy between the parties stems from the remarks made by Rav Ovadiah Yosef, spiritual leader of Shas, against Meretz leader Yossi Sarid.

CBC rejects Mideast item complaint

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

CBC ombudsman David Bazay has rejected one of two complaints by an American media monitoring group that criticized reports by the broadcaster's Middle East correspondent, Neil Macdonald. Bazay has not yet responded to the second complaint.

In a letter to CAMERA, the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America, Bazay states that an episode of the CBC Newsworld program, Schlesinger, which included a report by Macdonald, did not violate CBC's journalism policies. The 15-minute segment aired in May 1999 and was part of a longer report, Peace Deals that Don't Bring Peace.

In its complaint to the ombudsman, CAMERA contended that "the segment dealing with Israel and the Palestinians omits critical facts and context, blames Israel for failures in the peace process and completely neglects serious Palestinian violations of the agreements." CAMERA also complained that Macdonald's piece lacked credibility and that he cannot substantiate his claim that Israeli authorities uprooted "thousands" of trees to build a bypass road for the "convenience" of settlers.

Bazay dismissed CAMERA's complaint in a five-page letter. He pointed out that Joe Schlesinger's introduction to Macdonald's piece laid the groundwork for the report and broadened its context.

Schlesinger, a veteran CBC reporter, stated that "more than 200 Israelis have died in Palestinian terror attacks" and that Macdonald's report would focus on the affect of the Oslo peace process on the Palestinians, Bazay pointed out.

Bazay said Macdonald documented his claim that Palestinians are still largely "controlled and subjugated" – including by their own government. Bazay also found Macdonald backed up his statement that the "Jewish state has stalled or frozen many of its commitments while the putative Palestinian state has been reduced to an unconnected archipelago of cities on a small fraction of the land."

"I found that there was no violation of the CBC's journalism policy and that CAMERA ignored many of the things that the CBC actually said. They were complaining about things, [saying] they weren't in the report when they were," Bazay told The CJN.

Bazay also addressed Macdonald's report about Israel's creation of a bypass road. Macdonald quoted an Israeli source that the road had been built for the "convenience" of Jewish settlers.

Tamar Sternthal, senior research analyst with CAMERA, said the Oslo accords give Israel the right to build new access roads and that the bypass road mentioned in Macdonald's piece was built after an Israeli woman was killed in 1998 while driving near an Arab village.

CAMERA also questioned Macdonald's report that "thousands" of trees had been uprooted to build the road.

Bazay said he consulted the Canadian Oxford Dictionary to determine that "convenience" is defined as freedom from difficulty or trouble, and so Macdonald's use of the word in the context of the bypass road was accurate.

In his finding, Bazay defended Macdonald's estimate that thousands of trees were uprooted – CAMERA consulted an Israeli government official who put the number at 354, dozens of which were replanted – saying "Macdonald was there, you were not. The reporter was there and saw it with his own eyes."

CAMERA was stinging in its response to Bazay's findings. Sternthal characterized Bazay's response to CAMERA's complaint as "evasive." The media monitoring organization plans to launch a publicity campaign that "we hope will expose CBC's refusal to confront the misinformation in its broadcast and to offer fair and balanced reports," she said.

CAMERA is an unaffiliated, non-profit organization based in Boston with 35,000 member households.

After the Pope left the site, Israeli officials transferred his signed note to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial for permanent display.

Asked about the Pope's making the sign of the cross at the Wall, Rabbi Melchior said Jews have a "psychological problem" with the cross. But, he added, "I think that what's important here is not the cross. It's that he touched the Wall and the Wall touched him."

Bearing the message of the shared holiness of Jerusalem, the Pope spent the last day of his pilgrimage visiting sites holy to Judaism, Islam and Christianity in the ancient walled city.

Before visiting the Western Wall, the 79-year-old Pope arrived at the Al-Aksa Mosque complex, where he was greeted by the mufti of Jerusalem and other Palestinian officials.

Schoolchildren welcomed him with cheers of "Long live Palestine," while hundreds of balloons in the green, red and black colours of the Palestinian flag were released.

During his meeting with the Pope, Grand Mufti Ikrima Sabri urged him to "stand by justice in order to end the Israeli occupation of Jerusalem."

A day earlier, the mufti, who is the leading Islamic cleric in Jerusalem, accused Israel of exaggerating the scale of the Holocaust to win international support.

"Six million? It was a lot less," Sabri told the Italian newspaper La Repubblica last weekend. "It's not my fault if Hitler hated the Jews. Anyway they hate them just about everywhere."

From the Western Wall Plaza, the Pope continued to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, where Christians believe Jesus was crucified, buried and resurrected.

Calling the site the "most hallowed place on earth," the Pope recited the final Mass of his visit. Alongside him were clerics from the different, sometimes squabbling, sects that are represented at the shrine.

Security was tight during the Pope's tour of the Old City, out of concern for disruptions by Arabs or Jews opposed to his presence. No major incidents were reported.

As the day waned, the Pope travelled to Ben-Gurion Airport, where Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, joined by Israeli and church officials, saw him off for his return flight to the Vatican.

After climbing the stairs to his plane, the Pope stopped to salute the crowd, clasped his hands in blessing and looked skyward.

Before entering the plane, he turned and offered one final wave of farewell.

A year after NATO bombing, Balkan Jews unite

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Commentary

One year after NATO began its bombardment of Yugoslavia, Jews in the Balkans are building links among their communities – even as they wait for the next shoe to drop in Europe's most jittery region.

"In Yugoslavia it's like a time bomb," said Lidija Petrovic, president of the 100-member Jewish community in Zrenjanin, which is located in northern Serbia. "On the surface things are calm, but underneath things are still boiling. We feel insecure; we don't know what will happen and from where."

To guard themselves against any future eruptions, Jews from half a dozen Balkan states formed a regional umbrella group this month, the Union of Jewish Communities of Southeastern Europe.

They seek to buttress their tiny communities, share burdens and facilities, and work collectively in order to ensure Jewish survival amid the region's continuing economic, political and social uncertainty.

"There are very few Jews in the Balkans," said Viktor Mizrachi, the president of the 200-member Jewish community of Macedonia.

"We should work together as a fist, and not as individual fingers," he said. "Each can love his own country, but we have to form a fist or we will disappear."

The decision to form the union came at a meeting in Skopje of Jews from Bulgaria, Greece and almost all parts of the former Yugoslavia – independent Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Macedonia, as well as the current Yugoslavia's Serbia and Kosovo.

The inauguration of a new synagogue in Skopje and the energetic efforts at Jewish revival in Macedonia served as the catalyst for the meeting, which was co-ordinated by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

"I really think that this year something important and tremendous has happened in Macedonia," Yechiel Bar Chaim, the JDC representative for the former Yugoslavia, told the meeting.

"One couldn't have dreamt of such success," he said.

Massive fallout from last year's conflict in the Balkans is still being felt throughout the region.

Most of the 800,000 ethnic Albanians who fled Kosovo in the wake of Serbian terror have returned home, but revenge attacks and ongoing ethnic strife have forced tens of thousands of Serbs and Gypsies to flee in turn.

Crime and violence are rife in Kosovo, and there are fears that despite the presence of some 30,000 NATO-led peacekeepers, serious conflict may erupt in Kosovo, Serbia, Montenegro or even Macedonia, which has a large ethnic Albanian minority.

Moreover, the economic consequences of the conflict remain daunting.

Homes, businesses and much of Yugoslavia's economic infrastructure were destroyed. Bombed-out bridges, roads and railway lines cut regional trade routes, aggravating local economic crises in neighbouring countries as well as in Yugoslavia. In parts of Kosovo and Serbia, electricity, water and heating are sporadic – and jobs, consumer goods and cash are scarce.

"We don't have anything – clothes, medicines, food, money," said Petrovic. "The average salary is the equivalent of $25 a month, so we use barter arrangements for some goods and services.

"If we could see the light somewhere, that would be something, but the uncertainty is killing," she said. "My mother survived Auschwitz by hoping. I can't, of course, compare our present situation with Auschwitz, but we have little hope that it will improve."

What Jews in the region do have is each other.

In the countries of the former Yugoslavia in particular, personal links are tight. Before the breakup of Yugoslavia a decade ago, its Jewish communities came under one umbrella organization and lived in one country.

"We all grew up knowing each other, meeting each other, going to summer camp with each other," said Zdravko Sami of Macedonia.

Gorge Hajzler of Belgrade said that "This co-operation exceeds the framework imposed by the crisis. It is a co-operation based on long-term links from the past – family ties, culture, history."

The crisis over the past year tested Jewish solidarity. It also bolstered Jewish communal identity.

NATO bombers did not directly target the city of Zrenjanin. Still, said Petrovic, "during those months we would gather in the tiny Jewish community office. We felt a togetherness. When we went home, we felt better."

Now, she said, community members want to learn about their Judaism and expand. This month, with help from the JDC, they are taking possession of a larger building to serve as their community centre.

Thanks to contingency plans taken months before the bombing began, some 600 of Yugoslavia's 3,000 Jews were able to find shelter in Hungary during the conflict.

"No Jew lost his life during the conflict," said Aca Singer, president of Yugoslavia's Federation of Jewish Communities. "This would not have happened without general Jewish solidarity and moral and financial aid from Jewish organizations and individuals."

He paid special tribute to the efforts of community leader Mizrachi and fellow Macedonian Jews, who were spurred into action by the crisis, and presented the Macedonian community with an award honouring its help.

Mizrachi communicated daily with Jews in Belgrade throughout the bombing campaign, and the community also aided large-scale refugee relief efforts carried out by Israeli and other Jewish groups.

Last June, shortly after the end of the bombing, Mizrachi entered Kosovo and personally evacuated the head of the Jewish community of Pristina, who, as a Serbian speaker, was classified as a Serb and threatened by ethnic Albanians.

Soon after, Macedonian Jews formed Dobre Volje, or Good Will, an organization aimed at funnelling non-sectarian humanitarian aid to Albanian, Roma and Serbian refugees, which was modeled on Sarajevo's La Benevolencija organization, which earned international acclaim during the Bosnian war.

The Jews of the Balkans recognize the difficulties facing their new union, and it remains to be seen whether the initiative takes off.

Numbers are small, finances are short, visas and other travel arrangements can be difficult and political relations among Balkan states range from hostile to tense.

"We need to establish a modus operandi of working together that will free us from the prejudices of the countries in the region," said Solomon Bally of Sofia, Bulgaria. "We should make it a point not to get involved with local politics."

Still, several key areas of common interest were identified.

One was fighting assimilation, another was gaining access to resources through restitution and compensation, another was promoting cultural and religious education among Jews who are mostly secular.

Still another pressing issue raised by Jews from all countries was that of increasing access to conversion, a vital problem in communities whose members are overwhelmingly children or partners of mixed marriages.

Women have become society's caregivers: Todres

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women have become the default caregivers of society, says the president of Baycrest Centre Foundation.

"They are living the sandwiched life – caring for both their parents and their young children, Elaine Todres said at a recent panel sponsored by Na'amat Canada.

Also on the panel were Carol Greenwood from University of Toronto's department of nutritional science, and Dennis Raphael, associate professor of public health services and co-director of the Quality of Life Research Unit, University of Toronto. Moderator was Sally Mintz Levy.

Todres said that advances in medical care have allowed people to survive diseases that used to be fatal. As a result, women are caring for aged parents when the women are in their own retirement years.

'Living the sandwiched life'

The dependence often comes in stages, she said. "It may start with rides to medical appointments, but gradually, the needs of the parent grows," said Todres, who has children ages 15 and 17, and an 82-year-old mother, so is in the sandwich generation herself.

Between administering medications and injections, monitoring medical equipment and making financial decisions, Todres said, a caregiver's tasks can be quite complex. "As well, she may be in the midst of a career, may be caring for her own children, and sometimes her grandchildren. This can put a lot of strain on the family."

It is essential, she said, for the caregiver to establish boundaries. "Determine what you can and cannot do, and preserve your own self space. You need time to be with your children and partners. You may feel guilty, but a little bit of guilt is not a bad thing."

Engage other family members in various chores, she said. "Do not be afraid to ask; it is not an admission of failure. Sharing the responsibility with others can help ensure that the primary caregiver does not burn out. Men are not used to being caregivers – it is not that they do not care."

Greenwood said that caregivers should concentrate on eating a well-balanced diet, which will not only help fight against heart disease and diabetes, but will also help prevent memory loss in later years.

"Some things are beyond our control, she said, but diet is something that you can look at early on in life. Everything you do to protect yourself against [the other diseases], are the same things you should do to protect yourself against memory loss.

"By doing things for yourself, [such as healthy eating], you are empowering yourself, and protecting against chronic disease. There is enough evidence to suggest that a poor diet, that is low in vitamins and minerals, can lead to memory loss. Researchers believe that a high fat, lower fibre diet is an indicator of low memory function in later life."

Todres said caregivers need to feel good about what they are doing. "We are models to our own children, by the way we take care of our parents."

The worst thing to do, she said, is to feel alone. "You need outreach, support and counselling in order to help you deal with certain issues.

"We also have a role as political animals to require society to be responsible for the fact that we are aging. We now have the largest number of elderly in the history of the world. We must see what we can do to get stronger social services and a stronger outreach network, if we are going to survive," said Todres.

April is Daffodil Month

TORONTO — The Canadian Cancer Society is thinking spring – when volunteers sell fresh daffodils to launch Daffodil Month in April.

Daffodils will be sold this year from March 30 to April 2, a symbol of hope for the Canadian Cancer Society and for those living with cancer.

Five trucks carrying more than 9,600 boxes containing almost five million blooms drive across the country from British Columbia. Each truck makes about 25 stops in Ontario to deliver daffodils to Canadian Cancer Society volunteers in villages, towns and cities throughout the province. The target for Daffodil Days across Ontario is $2.4 million this year.

There would be no Daffodil Days without community involvement, and each year many companies organize pre-sales with their employees.

Buying daffodils helps to fund the organization's onging research, which has helped people understand the causes of cancer. The discoveries of the last 20 years have set the stage for a new era in cancer research in which improved detection and effective treatments will reduce the burden of the disease.

Almost every Canadian will experience cancer at some time, either personally, or through a family member or friend. Buying daffodils helps the Canadian Cancer Society offer a variety of supports to patients and their families from the time of diagnosis and throughout treatment.

For more information on how you can be a donor or volunteer, please contact the Canadian Cancer Society North York Unit office at 416-638-0771.

Toronto musicians don't retire, they keep playing

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Don't tell Jascha Milkis, 71, or any of the other members of the Toronto Senior Strings that musicians are supposed to retire at the age of 65.

According to Milkis, former second concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, there is an old saying: "Musicians never retire. They either play or they die."

So a few years ago, when the TSO told several of its members they were facing retirement, they got together and formed their own string orchestra.

The Toronto Senior Strings was established and in November 1994, they gave their first concert to an audience of over 700 people.

Their upcoming concert will feature two Senior Strings violinists, Jascha Milkis and Mikhail (Misha) Brat, 63, performing the Bach Violin Double Concerto.

The concerto, a duet of overlapping and emotional phrases, will bring to life the former teacher of these two violinists, Ilya Lembersky. Both Brat and Milkis studied with Lembersky at the State Conservatory of Odessa, albeit at different times.

"While Misha and I didn't study with Ilya at the same time, we knew each other in Odessa [Ukraine]. In fact, Misha's father, Jacob Brat, was on the panel that accepted me into the conservatory," said Milkis.

Milkis said he remembered Lembersky as a "warm and dedicated teacher who had many Jewish students studying the violin with him in Odessa.

"In 1976 or so, Lembersky made aliyah to Israel and lived in Herzliyah," Milkis said. "Until he died a few years ago, we were in touch several times over the years."

In Odessa, Milkis said he didn't feel any discomfort over being Jewish. However, once he joined the Leningrad Philharmonic, he felt a growing sense of anti-Semitism.

"I never knew whether they would let me travel or not [with the orchestra]," he said. "I couldn't see any future for my kids there."

In 1975, Milkis and his family moved to Toronto, and he began working with the TSO soon after his arrival.

His wife, Mariana Rozenfeld-Milkis taught piano at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

Milkis' daughter, Mara, is a solo violinist who has performed with the TSO. In fact, Milkis has played the Bach Double Concerto in the past with his daughter and the TSO.

His son, Julian, a solo clarinettist, studied at the Julliard School of Music. Julian, who has performed in many countries around the world, recently gave a concert in Moscow.

"Both my children now live in New York," Milkis said. They both found that they had to leave because "there wasn't a very good musical future [for them] in Toronto.

"It's a shame that a city like Toronto can barely even support one orchestra," he said. "Some cities in Europe have as many as four orchestras.

"For 25 years, I've been hearing promises that next year there will be an opera house in Toronto. They found money for the Dome – I don't mind that – but music isn't less important than sports.

"Music unites people. No one has ever been killed in the name of music. When people listen to music, they forget about hate.

The Toronto Senior Strings

"They've just established a single currency for all of Europe," Milkis said. "The next step should be a single national anthem. One national anthem would go a long way in uniting people."

For Milkis, the Senior Strings, a non-profit organization, is a way "to bring music to more people. We're not playing now to build our careers. Our careers are done. It's just to make more people happy."

Ruth Budd, a former bass player with the TSO, said that when she founded the Senior Strings, she wanted to be sure that concerts would be located at a place and time that was accessible to seniors.

Their next concert will take place on Thursday, April 6, at 2 p.m. at St. Andrew's Church (corner of King and Simcoe streets). Tickets are $12 at the door.

CBC screens Quest for Lost Tribes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Whatever happened to the Ten Lost Tribes of the ancient kingdom of Israel?

The question has intrigued Jews and Christians alike for centuries. Since their captivity by the Assyrians 2,700 years ago, the lost tribes have been inextricably linked with apocalyptic events.

For some Orthodox Jews and Christians, the reappearance of the lost tribes will either signify the prophesied coming of the Messiah or the second coming of Christ.

Even if these theories are far-fetched, the disappearance of the tribes – Reuven, Shimon, Issachar, Zevulun, Menashe, Ephraim, Dan, Naphtalie, Gad and Asher – into the mists of history is surely the stuff of an enduring mystery.

DELUXE KOSHER MEDITERRANEAN CRUISES FEATURE TORONTO CANTOR

Brothers David and Eddie Freudmann of Toronto and Netanya, Israel, respectively, have joined forces to present what David Freudmann describes as an unprecedented array of eight kosher cruises in and around Europe.

The kosher cruises, aboard two vessels in the Orient Lines fleet, sail various itineraries this summer around the Mediterranean, the Greek Isles, Scandinavia, Russia and the Black Sea.

"To my knowledge, it's the first time this number of kosher cruises has ever been offered in one season in one area of the world [Europe]," says the Toronto-based Freudmann, who is vice-president of Uniworld Travel and Tours.

The brothers, who have nearly 70 years of travel-industry experience between them, have arranged for Yaacov Motzen, the chief cantor of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, to perform aboard the Crown Odyssey during a cruise of the Aegean and Mediterranean departing Canada July 2. His musical accompaniment will be provided by Stephen Glass, also of Shaarei Shomayim.

"He'll be doing three concerts, two for our passengers and one for all the passengers on the ship," Freudmann says. "The cruise company asked him to do a concert for everyone. They were very excited when they heard he was going to be on board."

The cantorial concerts are included in three of the itineraries. The Aegean & Mediterranean I is an 18-day excursion to Turkey, Greece, Italy, France and Spain; the Greek Isles and Italy encompasses 12 days from Rome to Istanbul; and an extended Greek Isles and Italy package features an additional eight-day kosher sightseeing landtour of Italy.

Among other elements, the cruises feature daily minyans, Jewish-interest lectures and shiurim, and visits to Jewish sites, as applicable, in Istanbul, Barcelona and Rome. Kashrut is supervised by Rabbi Shmuel Weiss, a member of the Rabbinical Council of America and a mashgiach certified by the rabbinate of Israel.

The earliest sailing is the Midnight Sun cruise, which departs June 12 and returns June 27. The latest is the Black Sea cruise, which departs Aug. 29 and returns Sept. 9. Pre- and post-cruise extensions are available for all itineraries.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

Michelin Goes Hebrew: Michelin Travel Publications recently published five of its famous Green Guide travel books in Hebrew translation. Travellers more proficient in Hebrew than in English may prefer to consult the Hebrew versions of Michelin's excellent Green Guides for New York, London, Paris, Italy and Spain.

The South Carolina-based company has also translated select Green Guides into six European languages as well as Japanese, but has yet to publish a guidebook on Israel in any language. We hope the omission is rectified soon. For a catalogue of Michelin guides and maps, phone 800-361-8236 or e-mail miche lin.travel-publications-canada@ca.mi chelin.com.

Pharaonic Remembrance: Egyptian Art in the Age of the Pyramids, a major show of works dating from 2650 to 2150 BCE, may be especially worth seeing as a prelude to Passover and our remembrance of Jewish bondage in Egypt.

Predating the Mosaic age by several centuries, the 200 pieces in this traveling exhibit include sculptures of many royal figures, and relief carvings and funerary art taken from pyramid and temple walls.

The statue of Pharaoh Menkaure and a Queen is considered the Mona Lisa of ancient Egyptian art. It depicts the king who built the third pyramid at Giza and his wife.

Because the audio-guide commentary is oriented towards art history rather than social or political history, some might consider the show more suited for an art gallery rather than the Royal Ontario Museum, where it continues through May 22. Adults $15. 416-872-1212. www.rom.on.ca.

Juno award winner in Poison Wind

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Internationally renowned harpist Erica Goodman is thrilled to be performing in the premiere of composer Jeffrey Ryan's Poison Wind, part of Encounters 2000: Ryan & Wallin at the Glenn Gould Studio.

Goodman has a long history performing with the Encounter's series, so when she was invited to participate in the presentation of Ryan's music, she didn't hesitate. Pleased to be asked, she accepted – sight unseen and unheard.

"Jeffrey Ryan is one of the most up and coming composers we have. He's written pieces for major orchestras," says Goodman.

"I was familiar with his work. Two years ago, I played his music with the Esprit Orchestra at the Jane Mallett Theatre in Toronto."

Encounter 2000's artistic director Lawrence Cherney has teamed the works of Ryan and Norwegian composer, Rolf Wallin. Ryan's Poison Wind scored for harp and percussion, Ecce Homo and Two-by-Four, will be performed alongside Wallin's Stonewave, Ground and Yo.

Rounding out the evening's talent roster is percussionist Beverly Johnson, cellist Shauna Rolston, and the Encounters Chamber Ensemble with conductor Gary Kulesha.

Ryan's Poison Wind "finds its inspiration in the power of nature to fight back as the earth struggles to balance and repair itself." Poison Wind, just over 11 minutes, consists of three connected movements.

"I am really enjoying this music," says the Juno Award winner. "Some pieces you play – especially in new music, which I seem to specialize in – are very esoteric; the audience may not understand it.

"Poison Wind is different, it will be enjoyable and accessible because the harmonies and sounds are interesting and it has a rhythmic feel to it that I think people will relate to on first hearing."

Erica Goodman

Goodman has performed music from the classics to modern compositions. "I try to meet every challenge and keep an open mind," she informs. "But in all honesty, of course, it's fun to play something with a rhythm that makes it so much easier to learn and play with others. It is also rewarding to get through to a general audience."

Goodman has been wowing audiences on her harp strings for over 35 years. She is an ardent believer in promoting and educating the public about her passion. "We have to tell the world we are world-class musicians because the reviewers are not going to do it for us."

Goodman, a Toronto native, can be heard on a number of recordings. In 1980 she won the Grand Prix du Disque for her BIS recording Flute and Harp. Her latest offering, on Opening Day Records, is as a member of Trio Lyra with violist Mark Childs and flutist Suzanne Shulman, is from the Canadian repertoire titled Harbord Street.

Another upcoming Goodman concert, in conjunction with Music Canada Musique 2000, is a performance with Trio Lyra and the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir in Ben Steinberg's A Fist Was Once An Open Palm, at 3 pm on May 7th at Toronto's Temple Sinai and on May 14th at the Glenn Gould Studio as part of Robert Aitken's series – New Music Concerts.

As a member of the Amati Quartet, you can catch Goodman in recital on May 3rd at a Rush Hour Concert at the Artword Theatre in Toronto and on the evening of May 7th at the Living Arts Centre in Mississauga.

Encounters 2000: Ryan & Wallin is on April 5, 8 p.m., at the Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front St., W., $20, students and seniors $12. Call 416-205-5555.

The basic facts are these. In 721 BCE, Assyrian hordes from what is now Syria conquered Israel, taking into captivity 10 of the 12 Israelite tribes. The captives were supposedly scattered throughout Asia. Only the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, who inhabited the southern portion of the kingdom and from whom the vast majority of Jews today claim descent, were left untouched.

Simcha Jacobovici's cinematic take on the topic, Quest for the Lost Tribes, an informative and challenging investigative documentary, will be screened on CBC TV on Tuesday, April 4 at 8 p.m.

The root of Jacobovici's fascination has its origins in a 1983 film, Falasha: Exile of the Black Jews, he wrote, produced and directed about Ethiopian Jews, purportedly the descendants of the tribe of Dan.

Fortified with this compelling lead, Jacobovici travelled to India, China, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Uzbekistan, Israel and Tunisia in search of his elusive subject. Several of his locales are simply breathtaking in their ruggedness and remoteness.

A dogged investigator, he offers tantalizing hints that the Pathans in Pakistan and Afghanistan may well be the descendants of the tribes of Reuven, Gad and Shimon, claiming that they are animated by "a Judaic memory."

Jacobovici also shows how the Bene Menashe and the Bene Israel of India could be the offspring of the tribes of Menashe and of Zevulon. And he speculates that Tunisian Jews from the island of Djerba and Afghani Jews from Herat may be descended from the tribes of Asher and Ephraim, respectively. It's speculative but riveting journalism.

No propagandist, Jacobovici tries to steer a steady course between belief and disbelief.

He introduces us to Eliyahu Avichail, an Orthodox rabbi from Jerusalem who's absolutely convinced that the lost tribes can be identified and, in certain cases, should be resettled in Israel.

By the same token, he allows skeptics to have their say. Rivka Gonen of the Israel Museum observes that there is no historical evidence to suggest that the lost tribes can be ever be traced. Hayim Tadmor, a Hebrew University Assyriologist, notes that they were totally assimilated and did not survive the heat of the melting pot.

Believe what you wish, but the story of the Ten Lost Tribes continues to stir the imagination.

Teenage girl can't play with the boys in basketball tournament

Teen athlete raises human rights issues

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Risa Saraga is getting used to all the phone calls from the media, but she can't get used to the fact she won't be playing for her school in this season's biggest basketball tournament.

Like most 14-year-olds, she's interested in the action on the court, not in what goes on in the boardrooms and offices of the York District School Board. But Saraga's desire to play for her school's boys' basketball team recently led to a ruling from the board preventing her from joining the team for the Area West Finals, the tournament that culminates the hoops season in Thornhill.

Saraga can't understand what the big deal is all about. After all, she's played all the team's pre-tournament exhibition games and she's run into no problems playing for the Avalanche, an all-boys major peewee single A team in the Metro Toronto Hockey League.

Her battle to play in the hoops tournament has vaulted her into the public limelight and made her the centre of a human rights controversy.

Supporters argue that the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled in the Justine Blainey case that the Ontario Hockey Association was wrong in barring her in 1985 from playing on a boys' team.

Saraga was intensely disappointed by the Board's ruling, that seems to run contrary to the trend in human rights practices.

"I felt pretty bad because I played well all season," the Thornhill Public School athlete said. "They said I couldn't play so I wouldn't be hurt, but they let me play all the exhibition games."

Saraga is the only girl in the league. She tried out for the boys' basketball team only because her school didn't field a girls' team this year. Last season, she played on the girls' team and participated in the Area West Finals.

A shooting guard who's a big Tracy McGrady fan, Saraga has played in eight games since January and more than held her own against the boys.

She changes for the games in the school washrooms – a situation she doesn't mind – but she was very upset when her coach informed her that her season didn't include the Area West Finals.

"It's the tournament of the year," she said. "All the schools in Thornhill play in the finals."

When her family couldn't convince the powers that be to change their policy, Saraga exposed the situation to the Toronto media. The case became something of a cause celebre, with newspapers in Ottawa and Windsor calling to talk to her.

Saraga is aware of the legal battles that were fought over the issue in the past, and she said, "They should just let me play. They shouldn't have had the rule in the first place."

Saraga has played basketball since she was eight, joining a lot of local girls at garage nets in the neighborhood shooting hoops. She's played boys' hockey since she was about four and "nobody there said anything."

An all-round athlete, she's played softball at the JCC Maccabi Youth Games and during the summer, she likes to play soccer "just for fun."

Chaim Gamliel introduces an opponent's nose to the mat in a recent wrestling match.

Brother and sister have wrestling in their blood

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not clear whether Chaim and Sarah Gamliel have to wrestle for seconds at the dinner table or whether they wrestle over the television converter, but the brother/sister combo seem to have grappling in their blood.

Both are competitive wrestlers and Chaim, 18, recently wound up his season with a third place finish in the consolation round of the annual Ontario Federation of School Athletic Associations high school tournament. Prior to that, he captured a gold medal in the Crusader Classics event.

In the OFSAA competition, Gamliel, who wrestles in the 84 kg freestyle category, defeated last year's gold and silver medalists in two tough matches. He had to go to overtime to vanquish last year's champ, using a leg shot to knock his opponent to the mat.

Gamliel, a Grade 13 student at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate, said strength, focus and lots of training are the keys to his success.

In his first year as a wrestler as a 15-year-old juvenile, he placed second in the Ontario championships. Over the next few years, he lined his trophy case with a number of championship medals and trophies. He's also racked up his share of sprains and strains, separating his shoulder, spraining his ankle, jamming his finger and enduring muscle spasms in his back.

Three years ago Sarah was ranked fourth in Canada as an 18-year-old.

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

Is There (Jewish) Life on Other Planets?

After several failed attempts, NASA finally succeeds in landing two U.S. astronauts on Mars. Soon, however, they find they are not alone. Three Martians, with mottled, green skin and oversized heads, approach them.

"How do we communicate?" one astronaut asks the other.

"Let's dazzle them with our superior technology," says the second.

He unzips one of the compartments on his space suit and pulls out a gleaming gold cigarette lighter.

The Martians appear fascinated.

"Let's really impress them. Let's light it!," says one of the astronauts.

But as he flicks the lighter and a flame shoots upward, the Martians' skin turns from green to fiery red. They are obviously agitated.

Then one of the Martians shakes his swollen head, stretches out a thin, long green finger in the direction of the flame, and with a tone of severe rebuke, says one word: "Shabbat!"

The Rewards of Study

Strolling through the market place in the older part of the mystical city of Safed, I came across a vendor who was selling biblical texts in a most unusual format. These books were written in the smallest print on almost impossibly small objects.

One such text was written on a sphere no larger than an egg, and yet the artist claimed to have the entire Book of Esther inscribed (in minute print) on its surface.

Then the artist showed me his pride and joy, a colourful canvas woven with intricate patterns and tiny Hebrew letters embedded within.

"The whole Torah, the whole five books of Moses, are written in this one drawing," he proudly proclaimed.

Seeing my look of disbelief, he handed me a magnifying glass.

"Here, look for yourself – not a single letter is missing."

Reluctantly, I accepted the magnifying glass and began scanning the text. Since the well-known first line in Genesis appeared to be intact, I decided to move further into the Torah, into the Book of Exodus. My eyes alighted on a Torah portion I would never forget – my bar mitzvah parshah. My teacher had so drummed the portion into me, I would sooner forget my name than my portion.

Well, there was the first verse, then the second verse, but wait – the whole third verse was missing!

I jumped: "There is an error here!"

"Impossible!" shouted the vendor.

"I'll prove it to you," I confidently retorted. "Bring out a printed Bible."

And he did. Back and forth, the storekeeper looked at the Torah text, then the art, then the Torah text again, then the art. Finally, he yelled: "You are right. Ata gaon olam." (You are a world-class genius.)

Obviously, he had no idea this was my bar mitzvah portion and assumed I knew the whole Torah off by heart.

Enjoying the moment of adulation, I chose not to disabuse him of that notion.

Meanwhile, the vendor was still in shock and disbelief.

Finally, looking at me, he said: "OK, a whole verse is missing. But who else besides you or me will ever notice it? But, because of this minor flaw, I am ready to offer you something very special. I'll give you 10 percent off!"

And so bar/bat mitzvah students everywhere, study your portion well. You never know when it will come in handy.

EUROPEAN STYLE PEA & CARROT SOUP

THIS RECIPE BROUGHT TO YOU BY...

HERB CAPLAN

WE SELL Whirlpool FOR LESS

1111 Weston Road (S. of Eglinton) 767-1655

www.caplanappliances.com

12-14 cups water
2 cups yellow split peas
3/4 cup chopped onions
2 cups sliced carrots
1 cup diced celery
1/4 cup minced fresh parsley
1-2 tblsp. fresh dill
1-2 tsp. celery seed
2-4 tsps. salt
1 tsp. fresh ground pepper
3 medium potatoes, peeled & cubed

Bring peas and water to a boil. Skim off foam and reduce heat to simmer and add onions, carrots, celery, parsley, dill, celery seed, salt, pepper. Cook about 45 minutes, then add potato cubes and continue cooking over low to medium heat until peas are completely dissolved (approximately 1-1/2 hours).

Stir to blend soup. Adjust seasonings, adding more salt, pepper and dill to taste. Reheat on very low heat. Freezes well.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My buddies and I have decided to write this letter to try to save one of our closest friends from sure doom.The four of us have been close since high school and we do everything together, from going on trips to celebrating birthdays. We are all in our 30s.

Jeremy, one of the guys has just met a girl. We've all met girls and even dated seriously, and it's never been a problem, but this girl is a real winner.

She wants to be with us all the time. He can't do anything without her permission and when he finally does go out with us, his cellphone rings so many times he might as well have stayed home.

No one wants to hurt his feelings, but he is getting serious with her and he doesn't seem to see what a wimp she has made him into.

How do we get him away from this dominatrix?

Wimp War

Dear Wimp War,

It's sad that you all feel your close friendship is being jeopardized.

Jeremy, who is in his mid-30s, is a grown man. He has the right to date and even marry anyone he chooses.

I understand there is a certain feeling of betrayal you are feeling. After all, you have been together for a long time, and here comes a woman who seems to be breaking up your foursome. Perhaps she feels threatened by the closeness you all have and wants Jeremy more to herself.

Jeremy is enjoying himself or he wouldn't continue to get serious with her. Don't burst his bubble. Be happy for him. He needs the support of his friends. If she is part of his life now, try to accept her and invite her to come along. She needs to get to know and accept you, too.

Your foursome is experiencing growing pains. Don't give up. A friendship like yours lasts forever.

CIC dinner attracts over 1,300

PM pledges support for peace process

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Jews of Canada, came in great numbers from every corner of the country to show their overwhelming support for Israel, said Joseph Wilder of Winnipeg, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

He was speaking of the fact that more than 1,300 people from coast to coast assembled last week, March 29, at Ottawa's Congress Centre for the Canada-Israel Committee's 16th Parliamentary Dinner and Policy Conference.

The keynote addresses of the dinner were delivered by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres.

In his address, Chrétien pledged Canada's assistance to help move the Mideast peace process forward. He said that any help Canada might provide would be based on the needs of the parties involved.

In particular, the prime minister offered to ensure that Canadian peacekeepers would remain on the Golan Heights, where they have been for more than 25 years, part of a United Nations peacekeeping contingent of more than 1,000 soldiers.

Chrétien also offered Canada's services in helping remove land mines from territory between Israel and Syria, should the parties so request. "We are mindful that talks with Syria have not yet produced the outcome we all hope for," Chrétien said, "but we know that Israel will persevere.

Artist's work was her 'whole life'

One of the almost 800 gouaches by Charlotte Salomon.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In 1943, when she was 26 years old, the doomed German Jewish artist Charlotte Salomon entrusted 780 gouache paintings to a friend with these parting words, "Take good care of them, it is my whole life."

Forming an autobiographical opus called Life?or Theatre?, they blended reality with imagination.

Much like a storyboard for a film, the gouaches – opaque watercolors prepared with gum – recreated a life beset by personal tragedy and fascist persecution.

Four hundred and five of Salomon's illustrations will be presented at the Art Gallery of Ontario from April 14 to July 9. The exhibition, entitled Charlotte Salomon: Life? or Theatre?, will be at the Signy Eaton Gallery.

The works in the exhibition, its only North American venue, are on loan from the Jewish Historical Museum in Amsterdam. The exhibit is organized by the Royal Academy of Arts in London.

Born in Germany in 1917 into a cultured middle-class Jewish family, Salomon was the daughter of Albert and Franze Salomon. In 1926, Franze committed suicide, and four years later, Albert, a physician, remarried. His new bride was Paula Lindberg, an opera singer for whom Charlotte had warm feelings.

When Salomon was 19, she enrolled at the State Art Academy in Berlin. Forced to leave the school in 1938, the year of Kristallnacht, she was sent by her parents in 1939 to live with her maternal grandmother in southern France.

In 1940, she was taken to a French concentration camp in Gurs. Shortly after being released, she

The News in Brief

CANADA

Yom Hashoah

HALIFAX — Nova Scotia is poised to become Canada's fifth province to recognize Yom Hashoah. The provincial legislature last week introduced an act that would proclaim Yom Hashoah as a day of Holocaust remembrance. The province will join New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario, which have all passed legislation marking Holocaust Memorial Day. British Columbia is also considering similar legislation.

Frieberg Quits

TORONTO — Gerda Frieberg has stepped down as president of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada. Frieberg said she quit because the group accomplished its task of registering at least 5,000 Canadian Holocaust survivors coast to coast. The organization is planning elections. In the interim, Michael Rosenberg of Toronto will take over as acting president.

Top UJA Award

TORONTO — Ted Sokolsky, vice-president of fundraising for UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, received one of North American Jewry's highest awards this month, the Vivian Rabineau Award for Jewish communal campaign director of the year. Under Sokolsky's direction, UJA FEDERATION raised nearly $42 million last year. He is now piloting a new initiative called Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, to be launched April 16.

Rabbi Writes Harris

TORONTO — Rabbi David Schochet, president of the Vaad Harabanim, recently wrote to Premier Mike Harris, asking that Ontario put all religious-based schools on equal footing with Catholic schools.

ISRAEL

Netanyahus Probed?

JERUSALEM — Israeli police are recommending that former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu be indicted on charges of bribery, fraud and obstruction of justice, and his wife, Sara, with theft. The couple was investigated for official gifts they allegedly took with them when Netanyahu left office, and for services they received from a Jerusalem contractor.

Shas Inquiry

JERUSALEM — Israel's attorney general has instructed police to investigate the spiritual leader of the Shas party for allegedly inciting violence in remarks made against Education Minister Yossi Sarid. Shas leaders claim the probe is racially motivated against the mostly Sephardi party.

The Coptic Pope

JERUSALEM — The spiritual leader of Egypt's three million Coptic Christians said he will never visit Jerusalem as long as it remains under Israeli control. Pope Shenouda III, whose church has never recognized Vatican authority, made the remarks to an Arabic newspaper.

WORLD

Newspapers Duped

NEW YORK — Eighty American Jewish newspapers unwittingly ran a recent advertisement for a Christian missionary film about a rabbi who finds Jesus. The ad, placed by a Jewish firm unaware of the film's content or producers, showed a bearded man praying at the Western Wall, and touted the film as "the unforgettable story of an Israeli rabbi and his struggles in modern society." The film was produced by Morris Cerullo, a San Diego-based Christian missionary.

Doctor's Trial

VIENNA — A retired Austrian neurologist whose trial for alleged Nazi war crimes was adjourned indefinitely may have celebrated too soon. Judge Karlheinz Seewald stopped the trial just 20 minutes after it started last month when a psychiatrist testified that Heinrich Gross suffers from dementia. But Seewald is now having second thoughts after Gross told a television interviewer that the state did not have enough evidence to try him for complicity in the murder of nine children at a Vienna clinic during World War II.

Nursing Home Opens

SOFIA — Jewish leaders attended opening ceremonies for a Jewish nursing home in the Bulgarian capital. The home, which will serve 40 patients, was the result of a joint venture involving American Jewish organizations and a local community group in Sofia known as Shalom.

Rally Banned

SANTIAGO — Chilean President Ricardo Lagos banned a planned pro-Nazi international gathering slated for April 17. The recent announcement of the ban to a B'nai Brith delegation in Santiago came after Chilean Jewish protests.

Braille Haggadot

NEW YORK — Braille Haggadot for the blind or large-print versions for the visually impaired are once again available this year from the Jewish Braille Institute, free of charge. The Haggadot are also available on audio cassettes. To obtain a copy, call 1-800-433-1531 or send e-mail to: library@jewishbraille.org.

Apologies for Anti-Semitic Graffiti

WARSAW — Poland's president and prime minister sent letters of support and apology to a Warsaw Ghetto hero after vandals scrawled anti-Semitic slogans on the walls of his home in the city of Lodz.

The vandalism at the home of Marek Edelman, the last surviving commander of the 1943 Warsaw Ghetto uprising, occurred last month, after thousands of volunteers in Lodz cleaned up city walls long defaced by racist and anti-Semitic graffiti.

Vandals scrawled a swastika, the name of a skinhead group and the words "Jews Out!" on Edelman's home.

"Young people from Lodz reacted so magnificently to slogans of hatred and stupidity. And then, under the cover of night, someone tried to prove that evil must prevail," Prime Minister Jerzy Buzek wrote Edelman.

President Aleksander Kwasniewski sent a similar message to Edelman.

The clean-up in Lodz involved thousands of volunteers, including city authorities, the Union of Jewish Students and the Catholic Youth Association. Much of the graffiti had shown a Star of David hanging from gallows.

JF&CS to launch program for Jewish addicts

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) plans to set up a two-year pilot project to help Jews recovering from alcoholism and drug addiction.

The agency's board last week voted to affiliate with Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others (JACS), a New York-based mutual help group for Jews in recovery from booze and drugs.

That means a Toronto chapter of JACS is on the way.

It's a historic move by JF&CS. In the past, the agency has helped chemically dependent Jews mainly with referrals to groups such as Alcoholics Anonymous (AA), Al-Anon and Narc-Anon. The decision to set up a local chapter of JACS marks the first time a communally funded agency has moved decisively to tackle addiction – a problem the community has traditionally shied away from.

JF&CS is working to set up a voice message telephone line for chemically dependent Jews. It has appointed its supervisor of intake, Faye Geitzhals, as the liaison to JACS.

JACS will welcome Jews from across the religious spectrum, says JF&CS social worker Teri Kay. It will also work to dispel the myth that there are no Jewish addicts, as well as the stigma that comes with addiction.

Two-year pilot project

"This issue is like many others the Jewish community has had to confront, such as child abuse and woman abuse," says Kaye. A support group for Jewish addicts "has been a long time coming."

Until now, Jews in recovery have felt isolated and out of place, probably because meetings for them have often been held in church basements. It's important to provide a Jewish environment, Kaye stresses.

Spearheading the arrival of JACS in Toronto has been Neville Smith, a Thornhill businessman who grew up in an alcoholic and co-dependent family in his native South Africa.

One of the objectives of JACS is to explode the myth that Jews don't drink or do drugs. "We tend to believe that a shicker is a goy," Smith says.

He cites a 1992 New York study of 6,000 Jewish households. It found that the incidence of alcoholism and drug abuse was the same in the Jewish community as in society in general – about 12 percent.

That means, Smith explains, that given a Jewish population of 160,000 in Toronto and environs, there could be 19,000 chemically dependent Jews in the immediate community. A "minimum" of three other people – loved ones, business associates, etc. – are also affected, he says.

"The results are staggering," he says of the extrapolation. "It could mean as many as 57,000 people are affected in the greater Toronto area."

Smith says he wants to brainstorm with Jewish addicts. "We want feedback on where our priorities should lie." Among them is to set up a network for Jewish teens in recovery. Volunteers will also be needed to help set up a JACS Toronto Web site.

Founded in 1979, JACS runs kosher retreats that to date have drawn over 6,000 Jews from all denominations. Since its inception, the group has had over 3,000 dues paying members. Its mandate is to educate the Jewish public as much as to aid recovering Jews.

JACS relies on the traditional 12-step program of recovery from substance abuse, which Rabbi Abraham Twersky, the maverick U.S. rabbi and psychiatrist who runs a highly successful drug rehabilitation program near Pittsburgh, has tailored to reflect Jewish values.

Smith points out that there is a large spiritual component to the 12 steps. Seven of them mention God or a higher power.

However, the focus is always on recovery, he says, and the 12 steps have proven their worth for the last 60 years. JACS also guarantees anonymity.

Those interested in becoming involved can call JF&CS at 416-638-7800. The JACS Web site is at www.jacsweb.org

As we are, so are they

From the editor's desk

One of the things I cherished most in attending the Eighth International Conference of the Jewish Media in Jerusalem last month, was the opportunity to meet and befriend colleagues from other parts of the world.

As most of us know, the forces that prescribe the pattern of one's personal "destiny" are as much fluke and circumstance as they are choice and deliberation.

We begin on the path that our parents prepared. The path that we follow thereafter becomes the "story" of our own lives.

It is important, of course, that we take delight in our own stories. For, after all, they are all unique and important works, each a work-in-progress, revisable until the very last day.

Comparing my "story" with those of some of my journalist colleagues at the Jerusalem conference reminded me of what I remember most of the time: the lives of Jews who are from points flung far apart on the globe share so many common elements.

Ruth Hasan is a dynamo. She was always among the first reporters standing at a microphone, adjusting it downward to accommodate her five-foot-two-or-three-inch height, ready to ask a question of the lecturer or politician. It is simply not in her nature to let the politician "off the hook" as it were, if that hook was left dangling in the middle of a significant story.

Ruth Hasan

Ruth is Finnish, born at least five decades ago in Viipuri, a city she refers to now as being in "occupied territory," occupied by the Russians that is.

Ruth lives in Turku, a city that is home to 130 Jews. Since 1978, she has been the president of the Jewish community of Turku and the vice-president of the council of Jewish communities of Finland, in whose precincts live a total of 1,200 Jews. Her official education was in mathematics, economics and statistics.

Like the grandfathers of so many people we know in Canada, one of Ruth's grandfathers came to Finland a century ago from Lithuania. And there he settled.

His granddaughter, Ruth, is today a freelance writer, whose voice frequently speaks on behalf of Israel in a number of Finnish newspapers.

The photo of Boris Gelman is out-of-date. He has a closely cropped goatee and bears more than a passing resemblance to Chaim Weizmann, Israel's first president. Boris speaks neither English nor French and knows only a few words in Hebrew. But we managed to communicate every day quite nicely in Yiddish.

Boris lives in Ukraine. Since 1997, he has been the editor of Shahar, a monthly of the Sevastopol Jewish community and the deputy chair of the community. Born in Moldova in 1935, he served for over 30 years in the U.S.S.R. navy, attaining the rank of captain. His career could have been the subject of those long New Yorker feature stories. Since 1961, he has been the military press editor of Navy squadron newspapers and culture manager of the Flag of the Motherland. He is the author of Jews – the Heroes of the Soviet Union in the Battles for Sevastopol and Memorial to the Heroism of the Jewish Soldiers.

Boris Gelman

Boris is also the editor of the Journal of the Crimean War Research Society. He specifically asked me to advise CJN readers that he is interested in receiving information about anyone who may have fought in the Crimean War. He can be reached by telephone at 380-652-252-413.

Unfortunately, I have no photograph of Emanuele Ascarelli. If I did, readers would see the image of a Mediterranean-looking sensitive soul, warm, dark eyes and a playful smile.

Emanuele has been in the media for over 30 years. For the past 15 years, he has been the head of the editorial staff of Sorgente di Vita on RAI TV, a twice monthly Sunday night program featuring documentaries.

Born in Rome, Emanuele holds a degree in political science from the University of Rome. He is among Italy's foremost experts on the subject of prejudice and anti-Semitism.

Emanuele proudly recounts that his grandfather made aliyah to Israel at the age of 88. The Ascarellis are related to Enzo and Ada Sereni, the fabled family whose heroism helped establish the fledgling Jewish state and rescue "illegal" Jewish immigrants seeking sanctuary in Palestine.

One day, hoping it would yield a good story, I asked Emanuele about the etymology of his last name. He told me that Ascarelli is a Hebrew-language acronym in Latin letters: Az c'arieh Eli, meaning strong as the lion of my God. It was a code communication among Jews for many hundreds of years, understood immediately by them as they wandered in their dispersion and eventually settled, in the case of Emanuele's forebears, in the Italian peninsula.

It was not only a good story; it left goosebumps.

Bayefsky donates 22 works to Yad Vashem

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of Canada's most pre-eminent Jewish artists has donated 22 of his works to the world's leading Holocaust museum and memorial.

Aba Bayefsky's gift to Yad Vashem in Jerusalem means the Holocaust-themed pieces have found an appropriate home. They will be displayed in a new area of the facility, in one of the many recent expansions there over the last decade.

Two years after he approached Yad Vashem with the offer, Bayefsky last month completed the donation of 22 drawings recalling his haunting visit in 1945 to the death camp at Bergen-Belsen.

The donated works are part of Bayefsky's Epilogue series, consisting of four large oil paintings and 41 drawings, some in pencil alone and others in pencil enhanced with watercolor. The series is so titled because it was completed between 1988 and 1994 – some five decades after a harrowing experience in the artist's life.

While still in the uniform of the Royal Canadian Air Force, where he'd been an official war artist during World War II, a 22-year-old Bayefsky toured the just-liberated Bergen-Belsen, in May 1945, and recorded his impressions of the mass, open graves and skeletal figures still in the camp. These works became the property of the Canadian War Museum.

The death camp experience "was shocking to the point that you can't really explain it," Bayefsky, now 77, told The CJN. "I was so affected by it, I couldn't abandon it."

Thus, the Epilogue series is derived from the horrors he witnessed at Bergen-Belsen, which were seared into his memory. "It seems like yesterday," he muses of his visit, "and it's never left me."

The works donated to Yad Vashem, together with the rest of the Epilogue collection and the pieces done in Bergen-Belsen, were first exhibited together in a major 1998 showing at the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa, titled Reflections on the Holocaust: The Art of Aba Bayefsky.

"I'm personally delighted they[the works] have found a good home," Bayefsky says.

He decided to donate the pieces to Yad Vashem because he's become increasingly pessimistic that a permanent, free-standing Holocaust museum will be built in Canada. Two years ago, the war museum nixed a wing dedicated to the Holocaust, but officially, Canada's Jewish leadership is still hopeful that an independent Holocaust museum will be built with the government's help.

The works donated to Yad Vashem depict loosely rendered skeletal death figures. Some seem to be dancing or posturing in clown costumes and with military props. Others hold masks or bass drums. All are symbolic of the decay and destruction that was visited on European Jewry.

Community volunteers turn out to help sort, pack and deliver Passover boxes. The Passover food drive is sponsored by National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section. Committee chair is Rebecca Ber; members are Bonnie Dale, Karen Abels and Charlene Arje.

NCJW holding annual Passover Food Drive

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

TORONTO — The annual Passover Food Drive sponsored by National Council Of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, is truly a community affair, says the organization's executive director.

"Hundreds of people come out to sort food, pack boxes and deliver the packages. It is heart-lifting," says Terry Winston.

The food drive, chaired this year by Rebecca Ber, began in 1984. It supplies the essentials for one person or family for the week of Passover and the seder meal. Each basket includes juice, wine, chicken and Passover non-perishables, as well as candles and Haggadot, available in English or Russian.

"We are trying to ease the financial burden of Passover. For some people, it can be a very stressful and expensive time of year. We're doing our part to relieve this worry, and at the same time, pull the whole community together," Winston said.

People who require food baskets are referred by community agencies that include Jewish Family & Child Service, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, the Jewish Board of Education, Circle of Care, REENA, the Baycrest Centre, Huronia Regional Centre, as well as rabbis, she said. "We are the go-between. Baskets are only delivered to people who are referred to us. That way, we know that they truly need it."

This year, NCJW received about 2,000 names. "But that means more people, because families are listed under one name. Last year, the drive assisted more than 6,000 recipients and provided over two tons of food.

"What makes our work even more challenging is the fact that more and more...people suffer from the effects of extreme poverty. The changes to our social welfare system make it more difficult than ever for people to forge a lifestyle complete with a nutritional and well balanced diet. Therefore, food specially earmarked for Passover does not become a priority, or in most cases, a possibility," she said.

The basic food box costs between $60 and $75, and the family box costs over $100, she said. "Each box weighs anywhere from 20 to 50 pounds; food banks tell us that the average family eats about 10 pounds of food a day," said Winston.

NCJW sent out about 75,000 shopping bag inserts for people to fill, 30,000 of which went out with The CJN. "We lost our funding for these bags; so we had to find corporate sponsors at the last minute to offset the cost. The drive is also supported by Mazon Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress," she said.

Food can be dropped off at various points, including grocery stores, the UJA FEDERATION office and the Wagman Centre.

"Just about every [grocery] chain is involved," Winston said.

AZA marks 75th anniversary

By SIMONE JOSEPH

TORONTO — Parties. Boys. Girls. Food.

This is what B'nai Brith Youth Organization alumni think of when looking back on their experiences at BBYO, said Jules Kronis who has spoken to various alumni in past weeks.

"I could see from the glimmer in their eyes that they remembered their old flames," he said.

Kronis and Deputy Prime Minister Herbert Gray were honoured recently at a brunch celebrating the 75th anniversary of Aleph Zadik Aleph, the male component of BBYO.

About 220 alumni and current members of AZA and its female equivalent – B'nai Brith Girls – gathered at the BBYO office on Bathurst Street.

Gray, who belonged to a Windsor AZA chapter, and Kronis, who belonged to a Toronto chapter, reminisced about their gleeful AZA days.

"You told your parents you were going one place and then you went another place – like Buffalo," said Kronis to laughter from the audience.

Gray spoke of lively AZA meetings he attended on Sunday afternoons at Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue.

"Frankly, nothing I've met in the House of Commons in our debates there can equal what we did every Sunday afternoon."

Kronis reflected on the charity work he did at AZA.

"We were the light that brought hope and light to the elderly, sick, poor," he said.

Jeff Wagman, who was active in a Toronto chapter of BBYO from 1972 to 1975 and is now chair of BBYO's adult board of directors, said his first understanding of the Holocaust, first exposure to Jewish history and culture in Toronto and first connection to Israel was through BBYO.

Wagman, who is on the board of many Jewish organizations including Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University and UJA FEDERATION said that at board meetings, "You get a dozen people around the table. Sixty per cent of them are alumni [of BBYO]."

At the brunch, BBYO launched its leadership endowment fund. The organization hopes to raise one million dollars.

One of the reasons for establishing the fund was fear of a repeat of 1991 when B'nai Brith Canada withdrew its funding to BBYO, Wagman said.

BBYO is now funded by UJA FEDERATION, private donations, fund-raisers and government grants.

While there is no immediate threat to funding, the endowment fund is like an insurance policy, Wagman said.

"We don't want to be cut off at a moment's notice," he said.

That common beauty

The contrast between the two countries could not be starker. One country, Canada, is a land of wide open spaces, of vistas so vast they are more imagined than they are visible; the other, Israel, is a land of spaces so confined that a trip across its narrow waist lasts less than 15 minutes, of vistas so fully in view that borders seem to collide. One country has fresh water in lakes whose numbers are counted in the hundreds of thousands; the other has precious little fresh water and only two lakes, one of them "dead." One country shares the longest undefended border in the world with its neighbour; the other country defends its borders with its four neighbours by electrified fences, barbed wire, soldiers and satellites.

And yet the comparisons between the two peoples could hardly be more poignant. Both have had to prevail against the harsh climate and geographic conditions of their respective lands to bring forth their life-sustaining bounty. Both peoples live by and under the rule of law. Both peoples love freedom and abhor anarchy. And both peoples, in the words of the late Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, "stand for the same values of liberty, justice and democracy, which are the beauty of our lives."

That common "beauty" was enthusiastically, almost reverentially, acknowledged and celebrated last week in Ottawa at the 16th Parliamentary Dinner hosted by the Canada Israel Committee.

More than 1,300 people, among whom were approximately 130 parliamentarians, attended the dinner. They came from all parts of Canada, from the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic, from the largest cities to the smallest towns, from the urban manufacturing centres to the prairie heartland. And they came for one purpose: to publicly identify with the people of Israel, with their travails, their challenges, their achievements and their hopes.

The most precious of all hopes harboured by Israelis is the one most easily understood by Canadians. It is the hope that nestles at the centre of the "beauty" mentioned by Menachem Begin more than 20 years ago: the hope for peace and prosperity.

Because of this, the large turnout at the parliamentary dinner last week made the evening such a resounding success.

The CIC dinner was an unmistakably loud, unambiguous, pronouncement to the world, echoing symbolically what Prime Minister Chrétien actually pronounced that evening, namely, that Canadians will help Israelis in whatever manner we can, to fulfil their final and ultimate hope of peace.

"Canada is ready to help where we can to move the peace process forward," Prime Minister Chrétien stated. "The security of Israel is foremost among concerns for Canada."

No effort by Canadians toward Israelis, with whom we share that common "beauty" in our lives, could be more important.

Dignity for disabled in shuls

During my recent visit to Florida, I came across an intriguing article in a Jewish periodical, under the heading, "Devar Torah." In it, a well-known American rabbi, Avi Weiss, emphasizes the importance of caring for the disabled, and equates the need for synagogue ramps with the ramp that was required to access the Holy Temple.

Rabbi Weiss offers various reasons for the Temple ramp; one, no less, is to provide full access to all, sending a message that everyone is welcome.

I find it disturbing, however, that so few synagogues provide permanent access to the bimah itself, the lack of which deprives one of the honour of an aliyah to the Torah. There is hardly a mainstream synagogue in the Greater Toronto Area that provides this. There is even one large congregation in Thornhill that fails to provide access for the disabled to the building itself. In Toronto, Temple Sinai led the way in providing access by building a permanent structure leading to its bimah. Most significantly, they did this in a very dignified manner. There are many congregants who, though not totally disabled, find it difficult, if not impossible, to negotiate steps. It is high time that our synagogues paid appropriate homage to the value of human dignity.

Time for forgiveness?

In June 1986, my wife Miriam received a letter from the office of the Vatican in response to a copy of her book Memories of a Jewess, which she had sent to the attention of the Pope in Rome.

The above-mentioned book was published by a Polish publishing house and was well received by the Polish ethnic community in Toronto and beyond. Some readers urged her to bestow a copy upon the Pope.

She was not in a hurry to do this. But when she learned that the Pope had visited a synagogue in Rome, she concluded that it might be worthwhile to do so, after all.

When that letter arrived, we were dismayed and shocked. There was no word of sorrow or any sort of assurance that the Catholic Church would do its utmost to prevent such a horrible thing from ever happening again.

They just promised to remember the murdered victims of our people in their prayers – and nothing else.

We put the letter away in shame and showed it to no one. Now, we have decided to bring it to the attention of the public because of the recent visit by the Pope to the Holy Land, to contrast the thinking of the functionaries at the Vatican at that time toward the greatest tragedy done to us Jews by many Christians in Europe, accompanied by the silence of the majority of the Christian world.

Has the time for forgiveness arrived? Who can answer that?

Calling on Diaspora Jews

Why has the government of Israel not pointed out that the Palestinians have violated every one of their commitments in the "Oslo-Munich piece by piece accords?'

The answer I believe is fairly obvious. The government of Israel's hands are tied because of the power of the blackmail of the Arab oil weapon. It therefore falls on the shoulders of Diaspora Jewish leadership, particularly North American Jewish leadership to point this out in as many legitimate ways as possible, for example, by holding demonstrations in front of American consulates, protesting the immoral, unjust stance of the U.S. State Department, vis-a-vis Israel.

It is even more important for the grassroots of the Jewish world to demand a new strategy from their leaders to counteract their prevalent attitude of sacrificing Israel piece by piece for their own misguided and shortsighted ends.

Opposes possible shul merger

Regarding the article, "Beth Emeth and Beth David May Join Forces" (CJN, March 16), I think it would take a great deal of chutzpah for the two synagogues to actually go through with this.

There are many Conservative synagogues that serve residents in the Jewish neighbourhood mentioned. If Beth Emeth and Beth David are so wealthy that they can consider expansion plans, it is their duty to help fellow United Synagogue member congregations who are less fortunate, to develop themselves.

Synagogues are not for-profit corporations "competing" against each other, and particularly those who are affiliated with the same movement. The purpose of having such an affiliation is to support each other.

Help for agunot: prenuptial agreements

By RABBI BASIL HERRING

The fate of agunot has a particular resonance for many Jewish women in our time, even women who are far from being feminists, who are not inclined to raise a voice in protest against any religious status quo, and who otherwise have no quarrel with their private and public lives as proud and fulfilled traditionalists.

These very same women are often angry and upset when it comes to the fate of the agunah, those women chained against their will to a husband whom they once loved and embraced, but no longer do.

For such women, the words of Ecclesiastes has a particular resonance – it is indeed a "Time to go far from embrace," a time to end a marriage with a Get, or religious writ of divorce, rather than tolerate blackmail or deliberately inflicted pain and suffering, when a Get that is due is improperly withheld.

Why are so many so angry over this issue? I believe that it is because in this matter, more than most, women clearly perceive themselves to be at a decided disadvantage, significantly without the means to take charge of their own destiny, and at the "tender" mercies of men, men who are sometimes abusive husbands and fathers, whose attitude and behaviour is beyond the ability of the rabbinate to control. They look at the agunah and say, "it could happen to any of us."

Sadly though, the rabbinic establishment has few easy solutions to this problem of Chained Wives. Such is the nature, and the glory, of Halachah, or Jewish law, that divorce, like marriage itself, must be by mutual consent. And innovation and change in such weighty areas must necessarily be undertaken slowly and with real trepidation. Hence it is a real problem that cries out for redress.

There is, however, a long term solution to the problem of Agunot, one that is more and more discussed and promoted both by men and by women, rabbis and lay persons, activists and those who usually prefer low profile solutions. It is called a Prenuptial Agreement.

This ray of light at the end of the tunnel, is a pre-marriage document formulated by Rabbi Mordechai Willig, a rosh yeshiva at Yeshiva University, and rabbi of the Young Israel of Riverdale, New York.

This particular agreement was first suggested by Rabbi Zalman Nehemiah Goldberg (son-in-law of the sainted and authoritative late Rabbi Shlomo Zalman Auerbach) and a member of the Bet Din of Jerusalem. It was then modified and endorsed by a number of leading rashei bet din (heads of rabbinical courts) in America and Israel.

They are Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef, the former Sephardic Chief Rabbi of Israel, now a member of the Supreme Rabbinical Court in Jerusalem, Rabbi Haim Zimbalist of the Tel Aviv Bet Din, Rabbi Yitzchak Liebes, Av Bet Din of the Rabbinical Alliance of America, and Rabbi Gedalia Schwartz, head of the Beth Din of America, and of the Chicago Bet Din.

The Rabbinical Council of America has urged its members to use the agreement in every wedding ceremony at which they officiate.

Additionally, numerous legal scholars were consulted and remain involved in the writing and further refinement of the document.

The Agreement

The document, which is signed by both husband and wife-to-be, effectively says that the husband agrees to continue to maintain and support his wife until such time as the marriage is properly terminated.

A particular sum for this support is stipulated, approximating the actual cost of living for this couple, at the time of the marriage (currently $100 per day for the average couple, but in all cases to be adjusted in accordance with financial circumstances) and indexed for future fluctuations in the cost of living.

Thus, should the time come when the couple no longer lives together as husband and wife, the husband will have significant incentive to give the get, and will be unable to claim that it is a get me'useh (or forced get, which is halachically invalid) insofar as he has the alternative of maintaining the wife at the agreed upon sum.

Yet the husbands too are protected by the agreement. If the wife refuses to appear upon due notice before a bet din to rule on any outstanding disputes between them, or if she fails to abide by the decision or recommendation of the bet din, then the husband's obligation is terminated.

A second document, signed by both parties at the time of marriage, stipulates that in case of disagreement at the time of a future breakup, they agree to have their dispute adjudicated by a specified bet din, acceptable to both parties.

This second document minimizes the likelihood of either spouse unfairly exploiting the terms of the prenuptial, or putting up the kind of procedural roadblocks which are today, unfortunately, all too common in such cases. It also allows for any unforeseen circumstances to be handled in a fair and equitable manner.

An important issue concerning the prenuptial approach to the agunah problem is its enforceability in secular courts. In the North America for example, courts are generally loath to interfere in religious practices or disputes because of the constitutional separation between church and state.

Thus some have raised the question of whether the prenuptial agreement will be upheld in secular courts as a binding contract if either party refuses to abide by the terms of the agreement (i.e., the payment stipulated) or to accede to the ruling of the designated bet din.

While it is true that the prenuptial has not to date been tested in the courts, the prenuptial addresses this issue in its English formulation.

A number of subsequent emendations and refinements have been incorporated into the prenuptial since the original document was formulated, taking into consideration the various legal and constitutional issues involved.

This includes an optional clause invoking the principle of equitable distribution of marital assets. Of course the fine print may vary, depending on the state or country involved.

Les Mariés, by Marc Chagal captures the radiant optimism and the intense emotions of newlyweds. Rabbi Basil Herring suggests certain legal procedures for prospective newlyweds in the unhappy event of divorce.

Standardizing the Agreement

Doubtless there are some couples who might recoil at the prospect of considering – let alone signing – such a document just prior to marriage, when love, good faith, and mutual trust, are uppermost in their minds.

To inject such unpleasant thoughts and provisions into so joyous a time seems awkward. Yet the ketubah which is signed at every Orthodox wedding, in fact does precisely this.

In a time-honoured Aramaic formulation, it addresses the possibility of death and divorce and their financial consequences – albeit implicitly. Indeed, this type of prenuptial agreement is found in the classical tena'im, the standardized contract between Jewish husbands and wives.

Furthermore, by signing the agreement, today's bride and groom are in fact clearly stating their commitment to each other's happiness and well-being, no matter what the future may bring.

These are strong arguments in favour of incorporating the prenuptial agreement into all Jewish marriage procedures.

But strongest of all is the consideration that only if all, or most, marrying couples sign such a prenuptial, will its true deterrent effect take hold.

Thus, even if a couple were convinced that their spouses-to-be would never withhold a get – something which experience has taught can never be certain, in the absence of prophecy – it would be important for them to sign it nonetheless, as an act of social conscience and Judaic responsibility.

In this light, the refusal to sign a prenuptial could well be viewed as indicative of either a character flaw, a lack of flexibility, or at the very least an insensitivity to the needs of others.

Moreover, the standardization of this practice throughout the rabbinate would successfully remove the onus of social stigma from individual couples signing prenuptial agreements. The couples could merely state that "we wanted Rabbi X to officiate at our wedding, and he makes everybody sign it."

The prenuptial agreement will not solve all agunah problems. And it can only help those who sign it; those who marry or have married without signing such an agreement will not benefit directly from its provisions.

But as it become more and more accepted, with the help of God, we can hope that the very idea of using a Get for ulterior motives, no matter what the justification, and irrespective of whatever may have preceded the marital breakup, will become less and less tolerated by the Jewish community.

This is especially true for the Orthodox community, which is the one that, in the end, suffers the most from this terrible injustice.

It behooves us all to do what we can to change this attitude. Here, as elsewhere in contemporary Jewish life, we need to forge a sacred partnership involving rabbis and lay persons, men and women, the single and the married, parents and adult children, to ensure that the scourge of the agunah, with its attendant religious and social pathologies, and its immense potential for human suffering, is relegated forever to the past.

Rabbi Dr. Basil Herring is the Executive Chairman of the Orthodox Caucus, a national organization based in New York, that is the primary sponsor and promoter of the Prenuptial Agreement. For further information and background on the document, as well as a downloadable copy of the text, visit the Caucus web site at www.orthodoxcaucus.org.

Slave labour compensation

The following information was published by an agency of the federal German government: Only very few of the up to 10 million people brought to Germany as forced labourers during World War II have so far received any compensation. That will soon change, and this is manifestly due to the class actions filed by American lawyers to settle individual claims against German companies.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Given the political pressure building up as a result of the activities of the American lawyers, but also in the light of the court cases and debate surrounding the issue of Nazi gold, as well as decisions by major Swiss banks to return money deposited in Jewish accounts during the Nazi period, and by the biggest Italian insurance company, Generali, to pay out DM 180 million on unclaimed insurance policies dating from that period, it became increasingly inevitable that German companies would provide compensation for victims of forced labour on a voluntary basis.

About a year ago, Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and 12 leading German companies agreed to the establishment of a Foundation Initiative of German Enterprises, which would set up a fund to compensate the 300,000 victims of Nazi forced labour who were still alive.

During the war the Nazi authorities relied on forced labour. As ever more German men – later also older boys – were drafted into the Reichswehr and sent to the front, there was an acute shortage of manpower to supply not only the civilian population with food and other goods, but also to supply the needs of German soldiers, including the increasing demand for arms and military equipment.

Forced labourers came from countries such as Poland, Russia, Serbia and France. Jews from the concentration camps, the so-called "concentration camp workers," worked under the most appalling and inhumane conditions. Male forced labourers worked 80 hours a week, women 60. The food was inadequate. There was little or – in many cases – no medical care.

The judges at the Nuremberg trials referred to a slave labour program involving the deportation of more than five million people, which for many of them meant horrific cruelty and suffering. Forced labour was in many cases, especially for Jews but also for Sinti and Roma, as well as socialists and communists, a systematic strategy for working people to death. Once they could no longer work, they were sent to the gas chambers.

Under the terms of the agreement reached with major German companies, forced labourers will receive compensation in the region of DM 5,000 to 6,000. Slave labourers will receive DM 15,000. Commenting on the compromise deal, German government sources indicated victims could expect to receive the first instalments in summer 2000.

If you believe you qualify for compensation, ask your local federation, Canadian Jewish Congress or B'nai Brith office to help you.

Cleaning the Head

During one of our sojourns in the Land of Israel, we were introduced to an Israeli satirical show, N'kui Rosh – literally, cleaning the head. The overtones of the title were many, and the targets of the performers' satire were chosen without fear or favour. We lacked the Hebrew to understand the full range of jokes, and our Israeli friends usually despaired of explaining them to us.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

But for me, the best thing about the show was the title: Cleaning the head – or a clean head – or maybe an interrogative: "Is your head clean? Is your brain too full of trivia to take in more profound ideas?" I am straying from the intent of the show's producers, and far from the Hebrew grammar, but never mind. The title captured my imagination.

My delight in this title comes back now, between Purim and Passover. This period of time, spanning more than a millennium, seems historically backwards, since Purim's miraculous salvation came well after the redemption from Egypt. For Purim, we dress up, put on a mask, and eat and drink in pale imitation of the drinking feasts portrayed in Megillat Esther. In a few hours, the party is over.

For Passover, however, we spend days cleaning our houses, going through drawers, bookcases and closets, symbolically cleansing them of any chametz which lurks there. Yes, we are very careful. Even the most secular often renounce their bagel and lox, and take matzah in their lunches. There is something about Passover that demands that we clean out the chametz collected over the past 12 months, whether in our soul, our house, or just our lunchbox.

This period of time is like that famous narrow thread over which our souls pass to final judgment – frail but infinitely supportive, almost invisible but securely fastened at both ends, insistent that, as spring arrives, we contemplate the chametz, the detritus, of the past dark months, and sweep it up and out of our lives. Purim links us to Passover by taking us from the ridiculous to the sublime, from carnival to contemplation, from threatened annihilation to exhilaration at our liberation.

The easy part is the house cleaning. Whether you take it literally and scour every nook and cranny, or change dishes but leave a few corners, or just stop buying bread and load up on matzah, or take in a communal seder, there is an imperative about the run-up to Passover that grips us and insists we clean something out for a fresh look at the world.

So, cleaning the brain of chametz, of festering grudges, becomes the most challenging preparation for Passover. Out goes the regret over the friends we neglected during the winter – call them before the seder and invite them to join us. Out goes the simmering resentment over wounds and slights, real or imagined. Out goes the guilt over things we didn't do. It is not like Rosh Hashanah, and yet it is. We have a chance at the year's half-way point to take stock and choose a new direction.

Purim lets us laugh at ourselves in funny hats and masks. Passover demands a more sober approach. But we can't get there without that mental dental floss that cleans our heads, and our hearts, of resentment. Shakespeare thought envy was the canker worm that eats into our soul, but I would guess it is more the winter of our grudges that keeps us prisoner.

And I believe this is why Purim comes before Passover. We need to get outside ourselves, as we do on Purim, to experience the topsy-turvy world of the Purimshpiel, to dress up and conceal our identities – after all, so did Esther – even from ourselves for awhile, so that we can take a fresh look at who we would like to be.

Then we can get out the mental broom and start cleaning.

Israel must deal with incitement

Last week, Congregation Beth Shalom in Edmonton, hosted a Jewish – Christian – Muslim dialogue. The two-day conference, with the theme, What I want Others to Know and Teach about Myself, was the product of the considerable efforts of Rabbi Joseph Ehrenkranz, the executive director of the Centre for Christian-Jewish Understanding of Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, Conn. By all accounts, the conference was a great success.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Although I recognize the importance of this ecumenical work, frankly, it is not something in which I am particularly interested. As Pope John Paul recently confessed, Christians have, throughout the ages, murdered or been complicitous in the murder of millions of Jews; let the Christians get the understanding. I have lived in a Christian society all my life and I figure I understand them fairly well.

Besides, we have our own problems. Witness the recent unpardonable comments of Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the spiritual mentor of Shas, the Sephardi religious party. In a sermon delivered prior to Purim, Rabbi Yosef compared Yossi Sarid, the education minister and leader of the leftist Meretz party to Haman.

Rabbi Yosef proclaimed: "Yossi Sarid is the 'Dark Side'. He is Satan, may his name and memory be erased. How long do we have to suffer this wicked man? God will extirpate him, the way he will extirpate Amalek. Cursed is Haman, cursed is Yossi Sarid. He will be uprooted from the seed of Israel... Just as revenge was wrought on Haman, so it will be wrought on him."

The rabbi's message was delivered to followers at a Bukharan Quarter synagogue in Jerusalem and was broadcast on Shas Radio and on a satellite television hookup.

For those not familiar with the references, Amalek attacked the children of Israel in the desert after their flight from Egypt. He is described in the Book of Exodus as the sworn enemy of the Jewish people and has come to symbolize the archetypical villain in Jewish history. Haman, a descendant of Amalek, is the villain of the Purim story. His plot to kill the Jews is thwarted by Esther and Mordechai and Haman is executed. To be likened to Amalek and Haman, in the religious context, is to be equated with Hitler (may his name be erased) in the political context.

This was not Rabbi Yosef's first outburst. In an earlier diatribe, he referred to the Israel Supreme Court as "evil" and "unfit to judge Jews."

As the attorney general and his legal advisers considered whether to open a criminal investigation into the rabbi's incitement, he issued a "clarification" indicating there was no intention to do any violence against Sarid. However, cassettes with the rabbi's address were still being circulated and broadcast in the Bukharan Quarter after the clarification was issued.

Amos Oz, the illustrious Israeli novelist, has written: "Words are like bombs; they must be handled with care." Even more so with religious epithets. We all know that the insults and abuse heaped upon Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin (of blessed memory) – especially his being labelled as a "rodef" (traitor) – led to his assassination. What was probably most disconcerting about Rabbi Yosef's tirade was the reportedly electrifying effect it had on his followers.

I hold no brief for Yossi Sarid or Meretz. Their politics are not my politics and their view of Israel is not my view of a Jewish state.

However, I do believe firmly in democracy and in Israel as a democratic state. A democracy must protect itself from those demagogues who would seek to undermine the democratic nature of the state. A democracy cannot tolerate incitement to breaches of the peace; it cannot abide incitement to violence against ministers of the state.

The attorney general has requested that the police investigate Rabbi Yosef's statements. If a prima facie incitement case exists, he should be prosecuted for incitement.

The subsequent "clarification" – even if the facts support it as being sincere and there is serious doubt about that – only goes to mitigate the severity of the punishment, not to relieve Rabbi Yosef of criminal liability. Indeed, the necessity of issuing the clarification demonstrates the seriousness of the original incitement.

The Torah abounds in restrictions on speech. The most important restriction on freedom of speech is the prohibition on lashon hara – literally, "evil tongue" or slander. The right of every person to a good name and reputation is one of the best documented rights in biblical or talmudic law.

Maimonides said that a talebearer, even if he speaks the truth, destroys the world. Thus, even if Rabbi Yosef manages to evade the temporal courts of Israel, I have faith that the rabbi will ultimately have to answer for these incitements in the Court on High.

The Kirshner File

A primer on the peace process

Itamar Rabinovich is an old Middle East hand with an impressive resume – a professor of history who plumbs the intricacies of Syrian and Lebanese politics, a diplomat who was Israel's ambassador to the United States and its chief negotiator with Syria from 1992 to 1995 and, now, an administrator who is currently president of Tel Aviv University.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Rabinovich, therefore, is eminently qualified to bring clarity to Israel's conflict with the Arabs and the diplomatic efforts since the 1991 Madrid conference to defuse it. In Waging Peace (Farrar, Straus and Giroux), a primer about the peace process, he shares his considerable knowledge with readers.

Early on, he raises an important point. "There is no single Arab-Israeli dispute," he writes, "but a cluster of distinct, interrelated conflicts."

The first is the "core conflict" between Israel and the Palestinians. Two weeks ago, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators began final status talks in the United States in the hope of reaching a peace treaty by Sept. 13. But last week, the talks broke off on an inconclusive note.

The second, flowing from the first, pits Israel against Arab nationalism, and is fraught with national, political, cultural and, increasingly, religious dimensions.

The third aspect consists of a series of bilateral disputes between Israel and neighbouring Arab states such as Egypt, Jordan and Syria. A function in part of geopolitical rivalries, this conflict is gradually being phased out. In 1979, Israel signed a peace treaty with Egypt, followed by a similar agreement with Jordan in 1994. For the past eight years, Israel and Syria have been sporadically trying to nail down an accord. Last week, the Syrian track was in limbo yet again after Bill Clinton and Hafez al-Assad failed to reach a meeting of minds at a summit in Geneva.

The fourth dimension of the Arab-Israeli conflict is its international component. Fanned by the Cold War, the dispute mushroomed into an arena of Soviet-American competition, especially during the 1967 Six Day War and the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

To Rabinovich, the Madrid conference was the first sustained international effort to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict. It was the outcome of several converging factors. The dissolution of the Soviet Union left the United States as the sole superpower capable of exercising influence in the Mideast. The flow of one million immigrants from the Soviet Union to Israel convinced Arab leaders that time was not necessarily on their side. The Gulf War weakened Arab radicals and the PLO. The intifada (the Palestinian uprising), stretching approximately from 1987 to 1993, prompted many Israelis to wonder whether the status quo in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip was sustainable.

According to Rabinovich, neither Yitzhak Rabin nor Yasser Arafat envisaged something as dramatic as the 1993 Declaration of Principles, formulated in Oslo by Israeli and Palestinian diplomats. As he sees it, Oslo was all but inevitable when Israel's talks with Palestinian representatives in Washington after the Madrid conference bore little fruit.

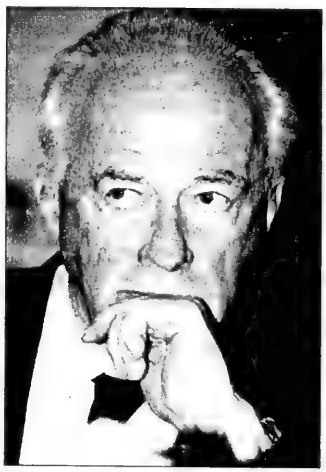
Having lost faith in that format – a charade in which Israel pretended it was not negotiating with the PLO – Rabin had no alternative but to reconsider his policy of boycotting that organization.

When Shimon Peres, the foreign minister, informed Rabin of Israel's secret contacts with the PLO in Norway, which had begun in January 1993, Rabin greenlighted the project.

His initial inclination was to strike an agreement with Syria. It would, he calculated, resolve Israel's problems in southern Lebanon, encourage Jordan to deal directly with Israel and strengthen Israel's hand vis-a-vis the Palestinians. Washington also preferred this strategy, being convinced that it would detach Syria from its alliance with Iran and contribute to a realignment in the Middle East favourable to U.S. interests.

For his own good reasons, Syria's president was interested in an accommodation. Assad believed that he could cope with the effects of peace on his regime by limiting normalization and containing Israel.

Rabinovich claims that Rabin's alleged offer to withdraw to the June 4, 1967 lines on the Golan Heights, conveyed through the United States, was purely hypothetical and premised on the assumption that all of Israel's demands would be met. "Assad chose to ignore the distinction between a hypothetical deposition with an honest broker and an actual commitment made in the course of a negotiation," Rabinovich notes.



Yitzhak Rabin

Rabin and his successor, Peres, were guided by different approaches to peacemaking with Syria.

Although Rabin assumed that Israel could expect nothing more than a cold peace from Syria, he thought that a peace treaty would remove the danger of conventional war, isolate Iran, enable Israel to pull out of Lebanon and consolidate Israel's relations with Jordan and the Palestinians.

Hewing to his vision of a "new Middle East," Peres sought a warm peace cemented by common economic interests. Assad was not interested, finding Peres' notion an offensive intrusion.

Driving home this point, Rabinovich quotes Assad's biographer, Patrick Seale: "Most Syrians would have seen such a settlement as exposing their society, nascent industries, cultural traditions and national security to hostile Israeli penetration. For Assad it would have made a mockery of his entire career."

It's clear that Rabinovich does not have a high opinion of Benjamin Netanyahu's contributions to the peace process. Preoccupied by political survival, Netanyahu's maneuvring created a zigzag effect which alienated supporters as well as adversaries.

Having signed the 1997 Hebron agreement, which displeased radicals in his camp, he ordered the construction of the Har Choma housing estate in eastern Jerusalem, which outraged the Palestinian Authority.

Judging him on his words and actions, Rabinovich claims that Netanyahu's support of the 1998 Wye accord was barely skin deep. He writes: It "did not reflect a conversion to a belief in a genuine political settlement with the Palestinians or a sense that Arafat was and should be his partner in the process."

Netanyahu, he adds, was unable to articulate his goals clearly and credibly. Yet he was central to two dominant and interrelated developments: the deliberate slowdown of the peace process, which brought it to the verge of collapse; and the effective, though reluctant, endorsement of the Oslo process.

Under Netanyahu, Israel's evolving relationship with the Palestinians weathered tension and crisis. Yet, Rabinovich believes, the 1994 and 1995 Oslo agreements have fashioned "a new reality" that both parties have accepted. "A web of vested interests, relations and expectations is there on which future negotiations can draw."

However, he issues a warning: "Neither the Middle East as a region nor the Arab-Israeli conflict as a cluster of specific issues and problems lends itself to grand schemes or easy solutions. A swift transformation of the kind that took place in eastern Europe when the Berlin Wall was toppled cannot be envisaged."

With these cautious observations, Rabinovich ends this thought-provoking book.

Celebrating the Get Legislation

PART ONE OF THREE

As you may remember, I take a special interest in the right of spouses to obtain a Jewish religious divorce or Get. To deal with this problem, in 1986 and 1991 I successfully lobbied on behalf of B'nai B'rith Canada and the Counsel of Orthodox Rabbis of Toronto for changes to Canada's family law. March 31, 2000 is the fourteenth anniversary of Ontario's first passage of the Get law I drafted. What is this all about? Has the law worked? What more can we do legally?

Background

In Jewish law, in the absence of a Get, future children of the wife and their descendants cannot marry other Jews, except for converts and others like themselves (called mamzers or bastards), even if the wife receives a proper civil divorce. Moreover, under Orthodox and Conservative Judaism, neither the children nor their descendants can ever remarry within the Jewish faith. Indeed, even Reform rabbis often encourage women to seek a Get in case one of their progeny decides to marry into a different branch of Judaism or move to Israel.

In Israel, only by obtaining a proper Get is one considered divorced from another Jew, even if one has a Canadian divorce decree. Worldwide, Jewish women — and sometimes men — are often held hostage by a spouse refusing to give or receive the Get, since the Rabbis are powerless to "grant" one. Unlike the civil courts, the law of the Torah binds Jews. According to our sages, God commands that the granting of a Get by the husband, and its reception by the wife, must be done freely and without coercion.

Prior to Jews losing their right to govern themselves with the French Revolution in 1789, Jewish Courts had the power to discipline spouses who used their ability to withhold the Get to extract unreasonable concessions. The Talmud even allows the flogging of such individuals in certain narrowly defined situations. In Israel today the Courts have jailed certain individuals, again only in certain situations, for using the Get as a tool of extortion or for just being obstinate. (One fellow stayed in jail for 30 years and died there rather than grant his wife a Get!)

There have even been instances of Jewish men who have refused to give a Get and, upon visiting Israel, have been arrested at the airport in Tel Aviv, even though they were not Israeli citizens. There are many other legislative sanctions available in Israel.

In Canada, our Get laws recited in section 21.1 of the Divorce Act and sections 2(4) – (7) of Ontario's Family Law Act give our Courts the discretionary power to prevent any spouse from pleading his family law case or defending it until the Get is granted. In the absence of such co-operation, the Court may even dismiss his proceeding outright. In plain English, this means the spouse who attempts to prevent the other spouse from remarrying in her faith could risk losing his rights of property division, support or defending a child or spousal support claim — or even the right of a civil divorce itself!

The Courts have vigorously applied these laws whenever the issue has been raised in Canada, but they have rarely been forced to do so. The mere threat of this legislation has diminished Get abuse substantially in this country, though sadly, some instances of it persist. Canadian Judges and our legislators have recognized that by refusing to grant a Get, a vindictive spouse can ruin the other spouse's future life by socially isolating her, especially if she is religious and cannot consort with other men outside of holy matrimony. They also worry about the status of future children and the whole issue of mamzers. Once the legislation is brought to the attention of such individuals, they usually back off and grant the Get. Lawyers therefore play a central role in reminding their clients about these laws.

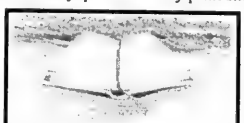
Time to ask questions

By RABBI MOSHE STERN



Rabbinic Reflections

A bright young friend of mine once observed that there ought to be a "fifth question" on Passover night at the seder. He formulated it thus: "Why is this night different from all other nights? On all other nights we Jews don't ask any questions at all. On this night we ask four!"

There was more than a touch of bitterness in his voice when he made the suggestion. He felt that the typical adult Jew wasn't interested or concerned enough about his religion or his people to ask any questions. Questions, like the four on Passover, were for kids.

Grownups might tolerate high school and college youngsters who asked questions about Judaism or the Jewish secular and religious establishment, but they themselves were eager to leave everything to the experts.

That was a number of years ago. Not much has changed since then except, it seems to me, that nowadays even our young people are asking fewer questions. While this may seem to some to be a sign of a healthy community, I believe it to be just the opposite.

I would not go quite so far as the man who declared, "There are no foolish questions; only foolish answers!" There are foolish questions (I have asked some myself) – but we would be better off hearing some of these, rather than hear none at all.

It isn't even that we need new and startling questions. You may recall the story of the economics professor who was visited in his office by a student who had taken his course 20 years earlier. While the professor was engaged in a telephone conversation, the erstwhile student looked idly at the final examination for the course, which had just come from the university print shop. When the professor was off the phone, the visitor excitedly waved one of the papers at him and said, "This is exactly the same exam you gave us 20 years ago – word for word!"

The professor smiled and replied, "I see that you really didn't understand what I was trying to teach you about the elusive nature of economics. Sure, the questions are exactly the same. But, after 20 years, the answers are all different!"

The questions Jews should be asking themselves, but aren't – even on Passover – are not essentially different from those of two decades ago. It may very well be, though, that the answers, if there are any, are very different from those which were offered then. What are some of the things we should be asking?

Who are the leaders of North American Jewry? Who appointed them? Do they speak for me? Am I part of the Jewish community? By virtue of what? Contributions in money or service? How should Jewish community money be spent? Do I have a say in how my money is spent? If so, how? If not, why not?

What actually happens in a Jewish school classroom? Have I ever visited one to see for myself? What really are the goals of Jewish education? Are they being achieved? If so, where and how? If not, why not?

Are we doing enough for Israel – or too much? Is North American Jewry a religious community or a secular one? What is a "successful" rabbi? Are the Arabs or intermarriage a greater threat to Jewish survival? Who is a "good Jew?" Is it possible to be too Jewish? Is anti-Semitism a Jewish problem?

Now that the Pope has apologized (sort of), will the church return all that was stolen and plundered from Jewish communities and warehoused in the Vatican? When the Pope demanded that Israel guarantee the security of Christian holy places, was he implying that under Jewish control they have not been secure?

Each of you reading the above list will feel not only that it is unrepresentative but that it includes some foolish questions. No matter.

Make up your own questions, if you wish, and after you have finished the Haggadah and the seder, propound them to yourself and your guests. The important thing, as my bright young friend pointed out, is that Jews should ask questions – not only at the seder, but "on all other nights" as well. And even he would agree that "this night" is as good as any to begin.

I suppose rabbis are just not happy unless Jews do ask questions. Witness the story of the rabbi who, after having served his congregation for 10 years in what was believed to be a mutually satisfactory fashion, submitted his resignation to the synagogue's leaders.

A special delegation of the congregation came to him, and its spokesperson asked: "Rabbi, please answer our question. Why is it that you want to leave?"

To which he replied, "Because that's the first and only question that any of you have asked in 10 years!"

Rich recollections

A Life on the Stage, A Memoir*, by Jacob Adler (Random House).

Books

Bernard Baskin

Jacob Adler, the famous Yiddish actor, died in 1926. Seventy-five thousand mourners poured into the streets of the Lower East Side of New York to pay their final homage to a beloved friend. When the huge procession entered the Williamsburg Bridge, every girder of the bridge was hung with men and women watching solemnly as the hearse went by. There was a widespread feeling that with his passing, the heroic life of the Yiddish theatre had come to an end.

This autobiography, translated and with a commentary by Adler's granddaughter Lulla Rosenfeld, was originally serialized in a New York Yiddish newspaper from 1916 to 1919 and again briefly in 1925.

These recollections are rich, varied, earthy – filled with passion, drama, friendships, scandals and rivalries.

Adler was forced to leave Russia in the wake of fierce pogroms and an active Yiddish theatre was no longer possible. He immigrated to England in the late 1800s and after a seven-year struggle established a viable theatre in London.

That theatre came to an end in a disastrous fire in which 17 persons were killed. Someone in the audience shouted fire and a scene was played out, Adler writes, when men and women ceased to be rational beings and gave way to blind animal panic.

"In one instant, inhuman screams filled the theatre. And then it began. A rushing, a pushing, a squeezing, a blind animal struggle to get out of the trap. A devil's mix of terror, agony, noble self-sacrifice against demonic egotism, and

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Take me out to the seder
Take me out with the crowd.
Read the Haggadah
And don't skip a word.
Please hold your talking,
We want to be heard.
And let's, root, root, root for the leader
That he will finish his spiel
So we can nosh, nosh, nosh and by-gosh .
Let's eat the meal!

Well before you can eat that meal, there's a lot of work to do. Today, the best recipes on the Net as you get ready for Pesach.

Let's start with some basics. If you're searching for classic recipes for gefilte fish, chicken soup or matzah balls (knaidlach), you can find them at Passover on the Net [http://www.holidays. net/passover/recipes.htm].

And who can forget one of the great Passover staples – sponge cake? Gil Marks has revealed some of the secrets of baking sponge cakes and takes a look at some variations including a Chocolate Sponge Cake and Lemon-filled Cake Roll in A Parade of Passover Sponge Cakes [http://www.jcn18.com/ newstand /marks/sponge cakes.htm].

There are also many sites that are more daring. Koshercooking [http:// www.koshercooking.com/recipes/passover/index.html] will tell you how to prepare Passover Cupcake Blintzes, Quick Pan-Fried Spinach Frittatas, Passover Jam Buttons and much more.

For Sephardi vegetarian recipes, don't miss A Sephardic Passover Seder [http://www.vegkitchen.com/sephardic.shtml]. (Please note that some of these recipes include ingredients such as peas which traditionally are not eaten by Ashkenazi Jews during Passover.)

For more unconventional dishes, try the gigantic Jewish-Food Passover Archives [http://www.jewish-food.org/] where you can help yourself to recipes for Chicken with Sun-Dried Tomatoes and Shiitake Mushrooms, Corsican Paupiettes, and 40 varieties of charoset including California, Egyptian, pear and raisin, Venetian and Yemenite, and Seven-Fruit Charoset from Surinam. I guess after sampling all the varieties of charoset, it might be time to try the Weight Watcher Matzah Soufflé [http:// www.jewish-food.org /recipes/passouf. htm].

Actually, you can escape the mega-oil mega-egg fat-laden dishes if you cook creatively [http://www.jcn18 .com/food/bt10.htm].) At Vegetarian Fatfree Passover Recipes [http://euler .ecs.u mass.edu/pass-veg/] you'll find out how to make healthy brownies, Cabbage Souffle Pudding and English trifle. And at Beit Chatulim [http:// www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/pschrcpt.htm] you'll find recipes for Baked Eggs in Zucchini with Hollandaise Sauce, Banana Nut Matzah Kugel and something called Not-Chicken Soup.

You can also find more traditional and non-traditional recipes at Marketnet [http://www.marketnet.com/mktnet/kosher/recipes/passover/index.html]. If all of that is a bit too rich for you, here are some suggestions for a lowfat Passover [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/article.asp?Arti cleID=102].

And finally, a recipe with star quality. You can really impress your family by whipping up Steven Spielberg's recipe for Matzah Brei [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/article.asp?ArticleID=90]. With just six eggs, two cups of half and half, four whole matzahs and four tablespoons of vegetable oil, it's probably Spielberg's smallest production ever.

Take me out to the seder
Take me out with the crowd.
Feed me on matzah and chicken legs,
I don't care for the hard-boiled eggs.
And it's root, root, root for Elijah
That he will soon reappear.
And let's hope, hope, hope that we'll meet
Once again next year! [http://mail.med. upenn.edu/~salem/passover-songs.html#ballgame]

Isaac Stern remembers

everyone for himself! In a word, a wild rout. A hell. All terrors loosed from their hiding places, all devils breaking free of their chains."

As a result, Whitechapel Jews would no longer attend the theatre. Nothing helped. Yiddish theatre in London was over – played out.

In New York, Adler built the once famous Grand Theatre. Jewish immigrants flocked to see The Great Eagle in his revolutionary portraits of Shylock, the Jewish King Lear and other roles that he made famous.

Members of Adler's immediate family, his wife Sara and his children Celia and Luther became well-known theatrical personalities in their own right.

This memoir, with 50 well chosen photographs, brings to life a now largely forgotten but honoured chapter in Jewish cultural history.

Isaac Stern My First 79 Years*, (Random House).

In this revealing musical autobiography, the author tells the story of conductor Serge Koussevitzky. "After a performance, an elderly, blue-haired lady came backstage and said to him, 'Maestro, there is no one like you; you are unique.' He said, 'Thank you, I know.' Another elderly lady said, 'You are the greatest conductor.' He said, 'It's possible.' A third one said, 'Maestro, you are God!' and Koussevitzky said, 'Yes, but such a responsibility!'"

Stern doesn't claim any divine powers, but is sure that success brings with it responsibility. It was this belief that led to his strenuous campaign – starting in 1959 – to save Carnegie Hall from demolition. He persuaded politicians, philanthropists and fellow musicians of the need to preserve this important cultural landmark. Eventually, after strenuous and protracted efforts, he was successful.

Another responsibility involved his presidency of the America-Israel Cultural Foundation, established by music lovers to rescue Jewish musicians from Europe, resettle them in Israel, and help create a symphony orchestra there. It assisted performing and creative artists in both countries.

The author's loyalty to Israel has been undeviating. During most of Israel's wars, he flew quickly to lend his talents wherever possible. Often he gave concerts at the front.

"Once a wounded soldier said to me, 'I want to thank you for coming.' I looked at him and said, 'You are thanking me?' I felt abashed. I always came away with a sense of deep embarrassment whenever I was thanked for having gone to Israel to play in a time of war."

Not an overly modest person, Stern reveals, however, that he does not play the violin as well as Heifetz, Oistrakh, Milstein, or, today, Perlman or Zukerman. Or Anne-Sophie Mutter, Digon Kremer or Midori. He writes, "I've always been self-conscious about the fact that I didn't have the necessary basic training and physical habits in violin playing. Perhaps that gave me the freedom to have the musical insights that are my strength and my pleasure, my reason for being. I don't think I've ever felt that I reached the true heart of any work."

Much of this book is concerned with concerts played, the author's relationship with conductors and fellow musicians, and his teaching sessions in China, Russia and Israel. Stern is a talented, warm, generous and thoughtful personality, and his recollections of a splendidly productive life are of unfailing interest.

Jewish Life

An unforgettable Purim in Cairo

By ELI COOPER

Although Purim in Cairo was completely overshadowed by the Islamic feast of Eid al-Adha, it was nevertheless an unforgettable experience.

Guest Voices

My day began in the clothing souq of Bulac, a lower-income neighbourhood near downtown Cairo, full of young children begging for 25 cents to buy bread.

Next was a stop at the Marriott Hotel, a picturesque 19th-century palace known for its clean bathrooms. Being a foreigner, I was able to walk through the beeping metal detector – no questions asked – and proceed downstairs to the casino where I observed – my jaw nearly on the floor– some robed sheik or other counting his stack of $1,000 US bills.

After a short subway ride to Old Cairo, I toured the Coptic churches and monasteries before ending up at the famous Ben Ezra Synagogue. Occupying the shell of a fourth-century Coptic church, the synagogue was bought by the Jews of Cairo in the ninth century and restored in the 12th by Avraham Ben Ezra, Rabbi of Jerusalem.

Despite the distraction of a noisy American pilgrim group, I ascended to the bimah to read the daily Psalm, almost shaking from the awe of the place.

Several legends are connected with the shul. I was told that the Temple of the Prophet Jeremiah once stood on the same spot, the place where he gathered the Jews after the first Temple was destroyed. There is also a spring, which is supposed to mark the place where Pharaoh's daughter found Moses in the reeds.

Afterwards, I proceeded to Shaar Hashomayim, Cairo's only active synagogue, in the downtown area. Dating back to 1905, it is quite impressive and features a large library. I was invited to stay for Purim services and of course did so.

It was sad, though, to see the remnants (a 100 or so elderly women) of a once-thriving Jewish community which at its peak numbered 80,000.

The Megillah was chanted in the beautiful Sephardi tradition, only to be interrupted by foot stamping and booing at the mention of you know who, much to the amusement of the policemen guarding the entrance.

Oh I almost forgot, the hamantaschen were delicious.

B'nai Torah to honour former grocery executive

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Retired grocery executive Harry Guest, a major player in kosher merchandising, will be an honouree at B'nai Torah's gala tribute dinner, on May 14.

Rabbi Raphael Marcus, spiritual leader of the synagogue for 20 years, is the other honouree.

Proceeds of the dinner will go to B'nai Torah's community programs, as well as to the establishment of a B'nai Torah Scholarship Fund to assist students in post-secondary school studies.

Guest was born in Toronto in 1920. He went to Clinton Public School and Central High School of Commerce.

In 1952, he married Peggy Bidnowitz, and they had one daughter, Syme Citron. The family now includes three grandchildren, lawyer Elliot, teacher Lisa and dentist Michael, and six great-grandchildren, who range in age from one to eight.

Guest joined Power supermarkets in 1958 as vice-president of merchandising and procurement. When Weston's bought Power in 1965, he joined Loblaws as vice-president of merchandising and marketing. Finally, in 1972, he joined the Oshawa Group as vice-president of merchandising and marketing for Food City and IGA stores.

While he supposedly retired 14 years ago, he in fact founded a consulting group, Guest & Associates, which is still operating. He also joined CESO (Canadian Executive Services Overseas), a Canadian government organization of retired executives who donate their business expertise to developing countries.

Harry Guest

He has taken on assignments in Hungary, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Guyana, Columbia, Costa Rica, Venezuela and several native reservations.

Guest has also been involved in promoting trade with Australia, Italy, Bulgaria, Brazil and Israel.

Every Tuesday he comes into the Clark and Hilda IGA as a consultant for their kosher services.

Proving the adage if you want something done ask a busy person, Guest has also been involved with UJA, the Baycrest Centre, and Mount Sinai and Toronto hospitals.

But he is most proud of the work he has done promoting kosher shopping.

When development began on Bathurst Street north of Steeles, Guest suggested that Oshawa Foods establish a Food City store in a mall planned for Hilda and Clark – a supermarket with a difference.

This Food City, Guest proposed, would be a complete shopping experience for the kosher food consumer, complete with in-store bakery, deli, fish and meat departments, all under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR).

A mashgiach would be there whenever the kosher departments were open. The kosher departments themselves would close on Shabbat and all Jewish holidays. As well, there would be a large selection of kosher groceries.

Guest went further. He tried to encourage Canadian manufacturers to accept kashrut supervision, convincing them that a hechsher is "like a sign of approval. Kosher products are looked for by Muslims, Seventh Day Adventists, vegetarians, and Jains. It should increase their sales at a very small extra cost."

Guest and the store manager at the Clark and Hilda IGA go to kosher food shows in the United States every year "to find new items" that they can stock.

For more information about the dinner, call B'nai Torah, 416-226-3700.

Concert to aid disabled

TORONTO — An upcoming gala concert showcasing compositions by Srul Irving Glick will feature performances by some members of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and the combined voices of three choirs.

The concert, a fund-raiser for Homes for Adults with Autism and Pervasive Developmental Disorders (HAADD) and the Reena Foundation, will be held April 23 at 7:30 p.m. at Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St.

The TSO performers include principal harpist Judy Loman and the Festival String Quartet under the leadership of Mark Skazinetsky, associate concertmaster. The singers are from Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Holy Blossom Temple and Lachan choirs.

Glick and his colleague, Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple, will conduct this holiday musical program.

Glick is the composer-in-residence of the Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where he has been choir director for more than 30 years. Under his guidance, the Beth Tikvah choir has won many awards for its interpretation and performance of Jewish music.

Guest artist Loman will play the King David Suite for Harp. The Festival String Quartet will perform with the choirs.

HAADD is a non-profit, grassroots organization of people with autism and their families and friends. They have joined together to advocate on behalf of their members with autism to secure better futures for them. The goal of HAADD is to help people with autism develop to their fullest potential and pursue independent lifestyles in the community.

Admission $15; students and seniors $10. For information, call 416-789-3291, ext. 224, or 905-763-8254, ext. 3034.

Zundel case still winding through legal system

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the fourth year in a row, the Ernst Zundel case wound its way through the Canadian legal system with no resolution in sight, according to the recently released annual report of the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC).

Beginning in 1996, when the CHRC referred the case to a human rights tribunal for adjudication, the case has ground its way through tribunal hearings, legal appeals and judicial reviews. The case is based on allegations that material posted on a U.S.-based Internet site, known as the Zundelsite, exposes Jews to hatred or contempt on the basis of their race, religion or ethnic origin.

"The Commission believes this case will clarify the extent to which the act prohibits the telephonic communication of hate propaganda and the extent to which the [Canadian Human Rights] Act can be used to combat the spread of propaganda on the Internet, no matter where it originates," the annual report stated.

Pay equity was among the issues that garnered the most media attention in 1999, the annual report also stated. That was a result of a $5.5 billion settlement reached by the Treasury Board and the Public Service Alliance of Canada (PSAC) that affected 230,000 former and current federal government employees, 85 percent of whom were women. The PSAC initiated the case with a complaint to the commission 15 years ago.

Pay equity legislation has been criticized in some quarters on a number of grounds. Referring to one criticism – that it interferes with market forces in the setting of wages – the annual report stated:

"This view overlooks clear evidence that wages are influenced by values and traditions as well as supply and demand.

"Pay equity does affect salaries and employer-employee relations, but so do legal provisions on the minimum wage, occupational health and safety and maternity and parental leave. Our market economy operates within ground rules fixed by legislatures. Pay equity should be viewed as one of these ground rules."

Another ground-breaking area in the legal arena was a Supreme Court of Canada decision that recognized that same-sex couples mst be treated the same as heterosexual common-law couples.

"The past year may well come to be regarded a a watershed in the recognition of [gay and lesbian] rights," said Michelle Falardeau-Ramsay, chief commissioner of the CHRC.

The Supreme Court of Canada's decision in the case of M v. H prompted the federal government to table Bill C-23, which would amend 68 federal statutes to extend benefits and obligations to same sex couples, the commission reported.

The CHRC received 1,781 complaints of discrimination in 1999 and completed work on 1,790 complaints. Discrimination on the basis of disability generated 34 percent of the caseload.

In 1999 the CHRC completed work on 383 complaints of racial and other forms of discrimination. Fifty-five were dismissed and 11 were referred to a tribunal for adjudication.

The commission's 1998-99 budget was $17.9 million. Its budget in the current fiscal year is to grow to $20.2 million.

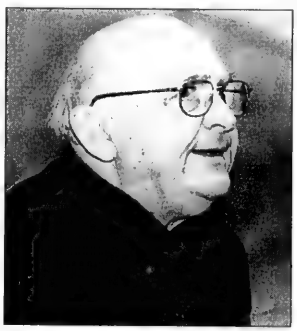
Israeli author discusses Holocaust and literature

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Addressing the question "Is it possible to write fiction about the Holocaust?" Israeli author Aharon Appelfeld told a large gathering here recently that man's nature compels him "to express not only his joy but also his pain" and that concentration camp inmates sometimes sang songs that "were as mighty as the suffering from which the need (to sing) arose."



Aharon Appelfeld

Speaking to several hundred people at York University under the auspices of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, the celebrated author of more than 30 novels including Badenheim 1939 and The Age of Wonders said some critics assert that literature should not enter the "fire zone" of the Holocaust, and that "it is best to let the numbers and the documents speak."

"I have no wish to belittle that claim," said the soft-spoken writer. "But I wish to point out that the numbers and the facts were the murderers' well-chosen means."

Appelfeld noted that much has already been written about the Holocaust, but only a small part of it is literature. "I do not include fantasies or those commercial stories and scurrilous writings which have inundated us since the end of the Second World War. Literature with a true voice and a face you can trust, is very scarce. The number of such works can be counted by a child."

What exists in abundance, Appelfeld said, is testimony – a rich body of first-person accounts by survivors. These are often characterized by a certain inarticulateness and lack of introspection "as if what had happened had happened outside of themselves," he said. Many also harbour an abiding silence: "While the survivor reveals, he also conceals."

In most portrayals of reality, art "always demands a certain intensification," Appelfeld noted. "But that does not apply to the Holocaust… Everything already seems so unreal that it belongs to mythology, and there is a need to bring it down to a human realm.

"There is a tendency to link the Holocaust to mystical terms," he continued. "It's understandable but very dangerous. Murder which was committed with evil intention must not be explained in mystical terms. This is not mysticism here but a blow which was committed against the central pillar of the Ten Commandments."

Many of these themes were repeated in the symposium on Appelfeld's works that followed. The participants were Jonathan Rosen, the New York-based novelist, and culture editor of The Forward; Chava Rosenfarb, the ex-Montreal Yiddish novelist now living in Toronto; and Dr. Vivian Rakoff, a Toronto psychiatrist and literateur.

Rosen recalled his first reading of Badenheim 1939, a novel about a resort town near Vienna that fills with vacationing middle-class Jews "who persist in their pleasures" in the summer of 1939 even as certain officials "are slowly tightening the noose" around their necks.

"Appelfeld is writing with bitter ironic precision," Rosen said, adding that the ending, involving unseen trains, haunted him for days. "The irony of this book was so sharp and so dark that it took my breath away."

Rosenfarb, who like Appelfeld is a survivor, berated him for keeping the Nazis out of his books and "giving us no target with which to direct our rage."

She also asked why his novels are almost always about 200 pages long – "Is the flow and ebb of his inspiration so rhythmically measured?" – and noted that the author, in her opinion, seemed to dislike Judaism and was preoccupied with conversion to Christianity.

Rakoff vigorously defended Appelfeld, saying "We do not need to be told what the Nazis did (in Appelfeld's books) because we bring this knowledge to the work.

"In Badenheim 1939, the people were presented as almost foolish because they could not understand what was happening to them. How dare we presume upon them our retrospective knowledge and blame them for not knowing what was going to happen next?"

He also praised the "corset of form" through which Appelfeld limits the size of his works. "This is an author who is not unconscious of the horrors to which he does not allude, and who lets the reader fill in the huge gaps which he leaves unfilled because they're unfillable."

Appelfeld inaugurated the Centre for Jewish Studies' Silber Family Chair for Holocaust & Eastern European Jewish Studies. He was in Toronto for 10 days and returned to Israel on March 21.

Kosher bakeries re-opened

TORONTO – Carmel and Isaac's Bakeries, which were closed recently for violations of the public health code regulations, have both re-opened.

Meanwhile, the Kashruth Council has embarked on a vigorous program of ensuring that premises under their supervision adhere to these rules.

At the time of writing, no other kosher establishments have been closed as a result of the recent public health inspection blitz.

Middle East peace negotiations face urgent deadlines: prof.

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Time is running out in the delicate Mideast peace negotiations, says Prof. Janice Stein, director of the Munk Centre for International Studies at the University of Toronto.

Speaking recently at a forum on Israeli-Palestinian final status talks, sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Congress in co-operation with the Canadian Zionist Federation, Stein said Israel must reach deals with Syria and the Palestinians by July and September respectively.

If these deadlines are not met, peace negotiations will be put on hold, at least until next spring, because of the upcoming American presidential elections and the subsequent changes in cabinet, Stein said.

Taking advantage of the opportunities for peace will entail political risk-taking for Prime Minister Ehud Barak, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, Stein said. "I don't know if they will succeed."

She predicted that Israel will give up the Golan Heights – such an agreement would be subject to security arrangements – and Israel will continue to withdraw from southern Lebanon, despite the possible political complications for Barak.

Although Barak will agree in principle with the Arab right of return to Israel, in the case of Palestinians who fled in 1948, there will be no significant return, and this decision will have Arafat's backing, Stein said. "There is some element of realism in the Arab leadership."

She said: "No doubt there will be an independent Palestinian state. This is not an issue of controversy in Israel. It's last week's news."

Some Jewish settlers on the West Bank will have to make the choice between living under Palestinian rule or making aliyah, she said.

Stein also thinks that Barak and Arafat will come to some agreement on Jerusalem.

Believing Jerusalem to be the most difficult problem of all, Stein said it will take a long time to resolve issues and that would make it difficult for Barak, "whose coalition is on the verge of dissolution."

In answer to a question, she said "Jerusalem does not have to be divided. Even Arafat, who speaks with many voices, is not making that demand."

Stein's pro-peace stand and that of her co-panelist, U of T Jewish history professor Derek Penslar – he argued that Israel is now an open political society – led to sharp questioning by audience members.

In keeping with CJC's policy of providing both sides of an issue, another meeting on peace negotiations will be held Sunday, May 2, at 7.30 p.m. at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, the co-sponsor of this meeting. Rabbi Sholom Riskin of Israel, head of the Jewish Settlers Association, will be the guest speaker.

"This should put a different spin on the peace process," said the evening's chair Harold Brief.

Lecturer compares and contrasts the Holocaust with apartheid

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In many quarters, South Africa's policy of apartheid has been considered synonymous with the racism of Nazi Germany.

Talia Nates

However, a South African lecturer on tolerance education concluded that despite similarities between the two regimes, the Holocaust remains a unique historical event.

"You cannot compare" the two, said Talia Nates, director of education at the Foundation for Tolerance Education in Johannesburg.

Last week Nates led a small group of listeners at Beth Habonim on a historical journey that traced the evolution of the apartheid policy and showed its similarities with Nazi racist policies.

"The apartheid regime borrowed the laws of Nazi Germany and used them, not on Jews, but on Blacks, Coloureds and Indians."

Nevertheless, South Africa never experienced the wholesale bloodbaths associated with Nazi Europe. "It could have finished much uglier than this…It was a miracle" that it didn't, she said.

Nates, whose father and uncle were saved during the Holocaust by Oskar Schindler, pointed out key differences that distinguished Nazi Germany from South Africa.

Where South African police ruthlessly mowed down peaceful protesters in Sharpville (1960) and Soweto (1976), the Nazis murdered Jews, not because of their political views or opposition to the state, but simply because of who they were. Where the full weight of the apartheid state came down on those like Nelson Mandela, who chose to resist, Jews who did not resist the Nazis were nevertheless singled out for murder, she said.

Jews were murdered for who they were, not for what they did, she stressed.

South Africa adopted many of the racial policies of Nazi Germany, even after the full scope of the Nazi horrors was known. The government imposed racial separation laws modeled on Nazi laws, it used pseudo-scientific methods to determine racial categorization – like the Nazis did – and it massacred opponents who dared speak out against the racist government, she said.

Back in South Africa, Nates spends much of her time on the lecture circuit. When she speaks to young people about social action issues, she advises them not to act as bystanders.

"The choice is in your hands," she said. "Don't shift responsibility. Look in the mirror and take responsibility. Being a bystander is a choice."

The Foundation for Tolerance Education is a three-year-old organization based in South Africa that maintains outreach programs to young people. Last year, Nates spoke to 10,000 young people and this year she plans to visit 100 schools. The foundation also trains teachers in tolerance issues.

Ryerson prof. killed in car accident

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Karol Steinhouse, who was killed last week after her car's airbag deployed in a minor fender-bender, was remembered as a dedicated teacher and a fierce supporter of social justice.

Obituary

Steinhouse, who was 47, her husband and their two children were longtime members of Darchei Noam Congregation, Toronto's sole Reconstructionist synagogue. The congregation's spiritual leader, Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker, remembered her as a charismatic woman with a keen interest in feminist issues.

Steinhouse had been a popular professor of social work at Ryerson Polytechnic University since 1990. She was working on her PhD in social work at the University of Toronto, studying how gender issues affect the delivery of social services.

Initially, an air of mystery surrounded her death. Steinhouse had been involved in a minor, four-vehicle mishap on Mount Pleasant Road. At an intersection, her car was bumped from behind, causing it to nudge the car in front of her. The airbag in her car then deployed.

She had no vital signs when emergency crews arrived at the scene. The only sign of injury was a bleeding nose.

An autopsy revealed she died of a ruptured aorta, suggesting it was the airbag that caused her death.

Steinhouse was "extremely sensitive" to more traditional Judaism, Rabbi Pinsker noted, likely because her parents belonged to an Orthodox synagogue in Kitchener, her birthplace.

"She was one of the sweetest, most wonderful people in the world," stated Temple Har Zion's Cantor Martin Steinhouse, a first cousin. "She loved her family and she loved her Judaism."

The funeral took place last Friday.

Steinhouse is survived by her husband, Ken McDonald, son Jesse, 14, and daughter Danielle, 18.

Peterborough grandmother named Citizen of the Year

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A few years ago, Erica Cherney, an active volunteer in Peterborough, realized it was time to cut back.

After telling her son Richard that she couldn't clear four days to visit him in Dallas, Cherney hung up the phone, wrote three letters of resignation, reorganized her schedule, and called back to say she'd be there.

"Ever since then, I've made a commitment that I will no longer chair anything or be the point person on anything…if I want to see any of my kids or do anything that's fun, I'm going to do it," she told The CJN in a phone interview from her Peterborough home.

Cherney, 67, may no longer be right at the forefront – although she has co-chaired her local United Israel Appeal (UIA) campaign for the past few years – but her involvement is such that the Greater Peterborough Chamber of Commerce recently named her 1999 Citizen of the Year.

She was surprised at the honour, she said – but probably more surprised to learn, en route home from the airport with her Toronto-resident son to attend the presentation, that Richard had been hiding in the back seat.

Cherney had only learned of the award the previous week, when she was on her way to visit her daughter in New York. Both her sons were able to attend the presentation.

Erica Cherney

A native of Ottawa, Cherney began volunteering for the United Way of Peterborough and District after moving to Peterborough 29 years ago.

Eventually she became president of the board of directors of the organization. She served as first female chair of Trent University's board of directors and as vice-chair of TV Ontario. A co-founder of the Arbour Theatre Foundation, she has been involved in over a dozen ongoing volunteer activities. Most recently, she was appointed to the Peterborough Utilities Board.

Like her late mother, Grete Cohen, Cherney has devoted herself to both Jewish and non-Jewish causes.

Cherney serves on the board of Peterborough's Beth Israel Congregation and has been active in Hadassah-WIZO. She also taught English to olim in Israel on the Yad BeYad program.

The Zionism she learned from her parents was strengthened when her maternal grandparents moved in with the family after they fled Czechoslovakia because of Nazism.

"They got the last boat out," Cherney said. Her grandfather, Julius Gerstl, had attended the first Zionist Congress held in Basel in 1897.

Cherney traces her interest in the arts as well as in volunteerism to her mother's family. When her mother was a young woman studying in Prague, Cherney's grandparents sent money to enable their daughter to attend a concert or the opera regularly.

Cherney's work life history includes a two-year stint as financial secretary of the Memorial Methodist Church in White Plains, N.Y., where she was involved with the local Reconstructionist synagogue. At the time, her first marriage had ended, and she was ready to put her bachelor of commerce degree back into use after a decade at home.

After 15 years in the United States, Cherney moved back to Ottawa so her young children (now grown with children of their own) would be closer to their extended family.

While working in her family's furniture business, she became reacquainted with Harry Cherney, who became her second husband. He was a business contact and friend of her brothers' who co-owned a chain of furniture stores in Peterborough.

Although Cherney's family business was sold when he died 15 years ago, Erica is still involved as a property manager.

Among her current community involvements, Cherney serves on the play selection committee of the local theatre guild and performs in an annual "Spring Tonic" fundraiser. She is also training for a dragon boat race for breast cancer survivors.

"I do things that are fun," she said.

CIC dinner attracts over 1,300 people

"The security of Israel is foremost among the concerns of Canada… and we seek agreements that will allow Israel to live within secure borders," he said.

Chrétien also announced that Canada will continue to fund the Canada-Israel Industrial Research Foundation for another five years. The foundation brings together small and medium-sized high-tech firms in the two countries.

Speaking less than two weeks before his planned visit to Israel and the Middle East starting April 9, Chrétien said the dinner was "in many ways, the first step on my Middle East trip."

He outlined for the audience some of the anticipated highlights of his visit in Israel that will include meetings with Prime Minister Ehud Barak, a visit to Yad Vashem and receiving an honorary doctorate in Jerusalem from the Hebrew University.

"I will be the first prime minister to visit Israel while in office," said Chrétien, "and I am very, very proud."

Speaking after Chrétien, Nobel laureate and former prime minister of Israel Shimon Peres expressed his positive feelings toward Canada.

"Canada is the message of the 21st century," Peres said.

Canada's democracy, Peres continued, expresses "not only the right to be equal, but the equal right to be different. While other nations build fortifications, Canada builds bridges."

Referring to the peace negotiations and the various sacrifices that might be needed to achieve peace, Peres said, "Everybody is for peace, but not everybody is for the cost of peace and peace is very costly."

He acknowledged that the security of Israel's borders with its neighbours is of utmost importance in any peace negotiations, but "I am convinced that a good hotel on a border will provide more security than a military position."

Earlier in the day during the policy conference, representatives of Canada's opposition parties expressed their parties' generalized support for Israel but could not elaborate with any real policy detail.

Responding to the politicians' presentations, one of the nearly 500 participants in attendance at the policy conference pointed out to the MPs that, except for Nystrom, their constant reference to Israel as "your country" left faint echoes of "dual loyalty" hanging in the air. To the applause of the large gathering, he clarified that the country of the Jewish participants at the conference was Canada. "We are Canadians," he emphasized. "We do not have dual loyalty."

In an afternoon session, a panel of journalists discussed the topic Israel and the Middle East: Canadian Media Perspectives.

Anna Maria Tremonti, Washington correspondent and former Middle East correspondent for CBC TV news; Carole Beaulieu, editor-in-chief of L'Actualité; and Patrick Martin, Comment editor of the Globe and Mail and its Middle East correspondent based in Jerusalem from 1991-1995, spoke of the various challenges that apply to journalists attempting to cover that area of the world.

"It is not about picking sides, but about telling people what's going on," said Tremonti. "It is not about a judgment, it is about explaining it to a Canadian audience back home."

The evening dinner, hosted by Wilder, began with with a performance by Ottawa's Zimria Choral Ensemble under the direction of Cantor Daniel Benlolo. Dinner co-chairs Don Carr of Toronto, Stephen Lipper of Montreal and Stephen Victor of Ottawa spoke about Israel, past, present and future. Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Kurt Rothschild delivered the pre-meal invocation and Neri Bloomfield delivered the toast to the dinner's special guests.

The evening concluded with a parliamentary tribute by Rob Ritter, the national executive director of the CIC, followed by a video presentation highlighted by comments from a number of Canadian MPs who had visited Israel as guests of the CIC.

Rabinovitch to head Ottawa museum

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Victor Rabinovitch, a career public servant, has been appointed resident and chief executive officer of the Canadian Museum of Civilization Corporation.

The Montreal-born Rabinovitch, who holds a BA in economics and political Science from McGill University and a doctorate from Sussex University in England, is the bother of Robert Rabinovitch, president of CBC.

Dr. John English, chair of the board of the museum, said: "The board is confident that Mr. Rabinovitch will continue his strong record of achievement in cultural and community action and carry the museums to new levels of excellence.

Victor Rabinovitch

"The recently announced project to build a Canadian war museum will be one of his many challenges."

Rabinovitch began his public service career in 1982 as a member of the Task Force on Atlantic Fisheries. He has served as assistant deputy minister at the Department of Fisheries and Oceans; assistant deputy minister for Cultural Development and Heritage at Canadian Heritage; and, since February, 1998, as assistant deputy minister, Income Security Programs at Human Resources Development Canada.

Prior to joining the federal public service, Rabinovitch specialized in labour issues, serving as national secretary for workplace health and safety with the Canadian Labour Congress and as executive director of the Manitoba Department of Labour.

The bilingual Rabinovitch credits his upbringing in Quebec for his comfort with both of Canada's official languages. "Because of the way we were brought up in Lachine, which was a predominantly French suburb of Montreal," he says, "my brother and I spoke French even as young children. For us both, French was simply a very positive matter of fact."

Rabinovitch has served on the executive of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir. He chaired the priorities and planning committee and was chair of the public service division of UJA.

He is also a strong supporter of the United Way and is on the board of directors of the Canada Dance Festival.

Rabinovitch and his wife Miriam have two children, Nina and Simon, who are both university students.

Getting to the dinner on time

It's more than a bit ironic. Here you have the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) – the Jewish community's "in house" lobbyist, noted equally for its effectiveness and discretion – putting on an extravagant show last week in Ottawa, its 16th Parliamentary Dinner and Policy Conference.

Now don't get me wrong. It was a spectacular, successful event. Politicians had to be doubled up and sometimes tripled up at tables because so many attended the dinner. Still, the question remains: For an organization that eschews visibility, why such a publicly visible dinner?

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

To understand the CIC's rationale, we should return to the politicians. Some people were surprised they showed up at all because budget votes in the Commons were scheduled at the precise hours of the dinner. And, for those who are unaware, budget votes are "do-or-die" for any government; everyone treats them very seriously.

Mysteriously, the schedule was moved forward to allow MPs to hustle over to the Congress Centre in time for the party. This could only have happened with the agreement of all parties and this is not an easy thing to achieve.

The CIC has credibility on the Hill for lots of reasons. But the extent of that credibility can only be appreciated when one considers that a great many buttons had to be pushed to ensure the participation of the politicians.

At stake for the CIC was not the dinner per se, but rather, what this event was supposed to achieve. Held every few years, the CIC parliamentary dinner, big and lavish as it is, allows the committee to operate discreetly during the years between dinners. It also serves as a reminder of how important Israel is to Canadian Jews. Politicians figure that if it is important enough for Jews to travel from across the country to express their support for Israel, it is important enough for them (the politicians) to be associated with the event.

Just ask Hec Cloutier, a backbench rookie MP who has a handful of Jews in his riding. One of them was at the dinner and so it should come as no surprise that so was Cloutier!

Rob Ritter, the committee's CEO, runs a seamless operation that produces. Along with his veteran chief lobbyist, the ubiquitous Shimon Fogel, Ritter was no doubt (deservedly) pleased with the outcome. He is no doubt equally pleased that his shop can return to its anonymous but effective ways for the next few years.

PASSOVER FOOD IDEAS

Food preparations from e-mail

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

I have a confession to make: I am an Internet food junkie! Each day, I eagerly look forward to my e-mail from the Jewish Food List. Members are from all over the world: New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, Israel, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, the United States and Canada.

In addition to the myriad of recipes in the archives, members share information on their favourite holiday menus, food preparation techniques, cookbook resources and kashrut guidelines. The hot topic right now is strategies that simplify Passover preparations. Check out the Web site at http://www.jewishfoodlist.com.

Here are some TNT (tried 'n' true) dessert recipes submitted by list members for your Passover pleasure. Enjoy!

Brenda Shenken of Auckland, N.Z., writes: "I make these petits fours every year and they are enjoyed by all. I try to have friends to dinner at least once during Pesach (apart from the seders) and it is fun to offer them something party-like. These are just a mouthful to have with coffee."

BRENDA SHENKEN'S PESACH PETITS FOURS

4 oz. (⅔ cup) ground almonds
1 tbsp. apricot jam
4 oz. castor (fine) sugar (If not available for Passover, you can process regular sugar in a blender or food processor before measuring.)
1 egg, separated
2 tbsp. cake flour (cake meal)
2 tbsp. potato flour (potato starch)
3 tbsp. cold water
6 ounces (about 1½ cups) finely chopped nuts
A little extra jam

Mix ground almonds, apricot jam, sugar and enough egg white to bind the ingredients. Roll into small balls and coat with the mixed flours. Mix yolk with cold water. Dip the balls into it and then roll in chopped nuts. Place on a greased baking sheet, 2 inches apart and make a depression in the centre of each ball. (Brenda uses the handle of a wooden spoon for this.)

Bake at 350 degrees for 12 to 14 minutes. Just before they are ready, fill the depression with a spot of apricot jam and bake 2 to 3 minutes longer. Cool thoroughly before storing. They keep well in an airtight container. Makes about 18.

Wendy Baker of New York writes: "Most of this is in my mother's words. The parentheses are my additions. The longer you cook this, the harder it gets and the more fillings it is capable of pulling out of your teeth as you eat it, but the better it holds the diamond shape. I usually go for it fairly soft and shapeless, as I have bad teeth. I make this for the extended family and my 100-year-old Aunt Jeanette, always most particular, complains of the poor quality of the shapes, but praises the good taste. This is a confection no one is neutral about, either they love it or can't stand it. Timings are imprecise as with tayglach, which this resembles, as honeys vary in water content etc."

WENDY BAKER'S IMBERLACH

2 lb. honey
3½ glasses matzah farfel (I use about 4 cups)
1 glass (or more) chopped hazelnuts (filberts)
Ginger (perhaps ¼ oz.)
¼ cup water

Boil honey, add farfel gradually, ginger to taste, then nuts (save some – see below). Brown on a big light (watch it like a hawk so it doesn't burn). Add a little water. Brown. (It takes awhile, not instant.)

Put on a wet board; spread and cover with nuts and ginger. Cut into diamond shapes and place on a dish. (You can layer this on the dish by sprinkling more nuts on top and covering with wax paper, putting nuts on the wax paper. I don't think plastic wrap would do it. Anyway it's harder to pick off the sticky candy.) Serves 36. Can easily be doubled or tripled.

Gloria Clamen of Toronto writes: "Each year three of my friends and I make an evening out of making this fabulous frozen lemon dessert for our respective seders. It's just fabulous and can be made ahead with just a little prep before serving. It makes a lovely, light ending to a meal."

Gloria makes her own mandelbroit because a family member has severe nut allergies.

GLORIA CLAMEN'S FROZEN LEMON CAKE

3 whole eggs
3 egg yolks
½ cup lemon juice (or juice of 2 fresh lemons)
Zest of ½ lemon
1¼ cups white sugar
3 egg whites
3 tbsp. white sugar
2 pkgs. Passover mandelbroit
¼ cup melted pareve margarine

Meringue Topping:
3 tbsp. white sugar
5 to 6 egg whites (or 1 small carton of egg whites)

Before starting, put a stainless steel bowl and the beaters in the freezer. In a double boiler, put 3 whole eggs, 3 egg yolks, ½ cup lemon juice and lemon zest. Gradually add 1¼ cups sugar. Use a wire whisk or hand blender to beat until thick while cooking. Set aside to cool.

Remove bowl and beaters from freezer. Beat 3 egg whites and 3 tbsp. sugar until mixture is stiff. Take a tbsp. of the lemon mixture and gently fold it into the meringue. Then take the meringue mixture and gently fold it into the lemon mixture. (This procedure ensures better mixing.)

In a food processor, crush the mandelbroit and add the melted margarine; mix well. Line the bottom of a 9-in. springform pan with the crust, covering the whole bottom and coming up the sides approximately ¼ inch.

Pour in lemon mixture. Freeze minimum 5 hours covered. Can be made several days in advance. Before serving, top pie with meringue. Using 5 to 6 egg whites, add 3 tbsp. sugar gradually and beat until stiff. Cover cake completely with meringue, going right to the edge as meringue shrinks. Create peaks on meringue with a fork. Put under broiler and watch it until it is golden brown. Makes 12 servings.

Cake: Generously brush 9-in. round cake pan with 1 tbsp. melted butter. Line bottom with round of parchment or wax paper. Brush with remaining melted butter. Sprinkle generously with sugar.

In food processor fitted with knife blade, cream butter. Add almonds and beat until mixture comes together. Add melted, cooled chocolate and blend well. Add egg yolks, 1 at a time, and continue blending until smooth and fluffy.

In large bowl of electric mixer, beat egg whites until foamy. Add sugar and beat until smooth and firm. Fold in 1/4 of egg white mixture to lighten and fold in remaining egg whites gently but thoroughly.

Spoon batter into prepared cake pan. Bake at 400 for 10 minutes, then reduce temperature to 250 and bake 1 hour and 30 minutes, until cake is crusty on top and toothpick inserted in centre comes out dry. Cool on rack. Invert onto large plate, peel off parchment paper and invert onto cake plate. Pour Chocolate Glaze over cake and spread or tilt cake until completely covered. Makes 8 servings.

Chocolate Glaze: In heavy saucepan, combine butter, honey, and water. Bring to boil, remove from heat and add chocolate. Beat until stiff enough to spread or drizzle over cake. If glaze is not thick enough, return to heat and simmer 3 to 5 minutes, mixing constantly.

Susan Binnington of Edmonton writes: "I have been making this honey cake for years. It is always a big hit at Pesach. The recipe is from The Great Hadassah Cookbook. One serving is 4 points if you follow Weight Watchers."

1 cup sugar
1/4 cup oil
1 cup honey
1 cup cake meal
1 tbsp. potato starch
1 tsp cinnamon
1 tsp allspice
Dash of salt

Beat egg yolks, sugar, oil and honey. Add sifted dry ingredients. Beat egg whites with a pinch of salt until stiff. Fold into batter. Pour into an ungreased angel food tube pan and bake at 350 on the second lowest rack in oven for 65 minutes. Invert cake pan until cold before removing cake. Yield: 20 servings.

Fay Leshman of Boca Raton writes: "This recipe freezes very well and tastes wonderful right from the freezer (which is too bad, because that is the way I eat it). Make several batches, because it always goes fast.

"I tried to make it dietetic, but it doesn't work. Eat less and enjoy it!"

FAYGIE'S FAVOURITE PASSOVER APRICOT PASTRY

Pastry:
1/2 lb. softened sweet butter or unsalted margarine
2 egg yolks
pinch salt
1 cup sugar
2 cups sifted cake meal
2 tsp. grated lemon rind
1 tsp. vanilla

Filling:
1-lb. jar apricot preserves
1/4 to 1/2 cup lemon juice, depending on tartness of preserves
1/2 cup chopped nuts (raisins and/or chocolate chips)

Combine all the pastry ingredients in the food processor. Spread 1/4 of dough on bottom of a greased 9 x 13 inch pan. Bake at 325 for 20 minutes. Refrigerate remaining dough until needed.

Remove crust from oven. While hot, spread prepared mixed filling mixture over crust. Crumble remaining dough on top. Bake an additional 30-35 minutes. When cool, cut into squares.

Vivian Anhang lives a very busy life. At Passover, things go into overdrive for the busy homemaker, teacher, home economist and cooking demonstrator. Anhang says she looks for ways to do things in a quick and easy way. In an interview, Anhang shared some of her recipes that she says "can be thrown together."

Anhang, a graduate in home economics and education, worked for the Providence Gas Company as demonstrator, tester and teacher. She teaches French at the Associated Hebrew Day Schools and is a cooking demonstrator at the Kashruth Council of Toronto's cooking sessions.

"With such a busy schedule, I look for ways to put together meals for my family and friends – meals that look and taste great but don't take much time to prepare."

Here are a few of Anhang's tested quick and easy to prepare recipes.

1 small head of cabbage shredded, washed, inspected and soaked in salt water
½ cup sugar
1-1½ lbs ground beef
½ cup chopped onion and 2 tsp. oil for frying or 1 package onion soup mix
Salt and pepper to taste
¼ cup ketchup
1 large can tomato sauce diluted with ½ cup water

Drain cabbage, dry, sprinkle with sugar and freeze for 48 hours or longer. Defrost before using. Cabbage can be boiled and used when tender. Sauté meat until golden brown. Add sautéed onion or onion soup mix to the meat. Season to taste. Add ketchup and mix.

Preheat oven to 375. Spray 9 x 13-inch pan with vegetable spray. Spread a layer of diluted sauce, a layer of defrosted cabbage, a layer of sautéed beef. Repeat until all ingredients are used up, ending with a layer of sauce.

Cover and bake 30-40 minutes. Uncover and bake an additional 30 minutes. Can be served hot or cold. Serves 6-8.

QUICK POTATO AND MEAT CASSEROLE

2 tsp. oil
2 medium onions, chopped or ½ package onion soup mix
1 lb. ground beef
4 eggs, beaten
12 medium potatoes washed, boiled, peeled and mashed
Salt and pepper to taste.

Preheat oven to 375. Sauté onions in oil (if using). Remove onions from pan. Sauté ground beef until golden brown. Combine all ingredients and mix well. Pat into a greased 9 x 13-inch pan. Bake in preheated oven 30-35 minutes or until lightly brown. Serve hot or cold. Serves 6-8.

QUICK AS A WINK CHICKEN

1 chicken cut in 8 or 10 pieces
1 package onion soup mix
3 garlic cloves, or garlic powder to taste

Wash and dry chicken pieces. Sprinkle generously with onion soup mix and chopped garlic or garlic powder. Let stand one hour or overnight in the refrigerator. Preheat oven to 400. Place in a shallow pan lined with heavy duty foil. Bake chicken uncovered for 45 minutes. Cover and bake an additional 25 minutes or until tender. Serves 4. Note: Can be frozen.

QUICK TOMATO SALAD

4-6 ripe tomatoes, sliced
1 medium onion, sliced
1½ tbsp. vinegar
3 tbsp. oil
Salt and pepper to taste

Combine all ingredients. Mix well. Serves 4-6. Can keep overnight

Passover Food Ideas

Keeping menu simple is good guideline at Passover

For many cooks, varying the menu during Passover can be complex, especially those who do not have years of experience in Passover cooking. During the week, Passover recipes should meet the normal requirements of the contemporary family: quick, delicious and low in added salt and fat. Chicken and turkey fit the healthy eating aspects both for seders and daily dinners.

A good guideline for making Passover meals is to keep it simple: Confusion results from too many exotic ingredients. That does not mean, however, that meals need to be boiled chicken and potatoes! Empire Kosher Foods offers these recipes:

GROUND CHICKEN MEAT LOAF

An economical, tasty and simple meal to make for every day. You can either use ground chicken for more flavour, or ground turkey for a hearty dinner that cooks while you set the table, help with homework or read the paper.

1 lb. ground chicken or ground turkey
¼ cup matzah meal
¼ cup water
2 eggs, slightly beaten
½ cup minced onion
⅛ tsp. pepper
1 small can tomato mushroom sauce

Combine chicken matzah meal, water, eggs, minced onion and pepper. Do not over mix. Top with sauce, bake at 375 for 45 minutes to 1 hour or until done. Serve with potatoes, and a green salad.

FRUIT STUFFED ROASTER

This is a perfect chicken to serve at Passover. The fruit stuffing makes a good side dish and a savoury condiment.

2 roasters
2 cups pitted prunes
2 cups dried apricots
Boiling water
2 tbsp. chicken fat or pareve margarine
1 cup finely chopped onion
2 cups chopped peeled apples
1 tsp. cinnamon

The night before, pour enough boiling water over the dried fruits to cover by one inch. Soak for 45 minutes, drain well and chop coarsely. Refrigerate. The next day, in skillet, heat the chicken fat or margarine and saute onion until soft and golden. Add apples, cook one minute, add prunes and apricots, mix well. Sprinkle with cinnamon, cook over low heat for about 5 minutes. Remove and let cool.

Preheat oven to 350. Stuff roasters with fruit mixture, and roast for 1½ to 2 hours.

KEY WEST CHICKEN BREASTS

4 boneless chicken breast cutlets
Juice of ½ fresh lime
2 tbsp. grated fresh ginger root
½ cup sherry or white wine
2 tbsp. cottonseed oil
1 large onion, sliced
½ cup sliced mushrooms
½ cup chicken broth

Mix lime juice, sherry or wine and 1 tbsp. grated ginger (fresh is much better than dried) and marinate cutlets for at least 1 hour.

Saute onions and mushrooms in 1 tbsp. oil until soft and golden. Remove. Add remaining oil, add drained chicken breasts and saute on both sides. Return mushrooms and onion to pan, add chicken broth, the additional 1 tbsp. of ginger and lime if desired, and cook for about 5-7 minutes or until done.

CHICKEN CACCIATORE

1 Rock Cornish chicken
2 tbsp. cottonseed oil
1 finely sliced onion
Large can tomatoes or 8 medium fresh tomatoes
1 clove garlic
¼ tsp. pepper
½ cup white wine or chicken broth

Cut up chicken, cook in deep skillet in oil until browned. Add onion and cook until onion is transparent and golden. Add remaining ingredients, cover tightly. Simmer until chicken is tender and tomatoes are reduced to a thick sauce. Serve with boiled parslied potatoes.

CHICKEN VERONIQUE

2 small (2½ lb.) Rock Cornish chickens grated zest of 4 lemons
2 tbsp. cottonseed oil
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 lb. red seedless grapes
1 tbsp. red wine

Wash and dry chickens, inside and out. Preheat oven to 425. Pepper inside and rub with lemon zest. Mix oil and lemon juice, rub outside of chickens with this mixture. Wash grapes, remove stems, fill the cavity of the chickens with the grapes. Place chickens in shallow pan and roast for 20 minutes. Reduce heat to 350, roast another 20 to 25 minutes. Turn chickens and baste with pan juices half way through the cooking. Remove chickens. Skim fat from the juices, add the wine, whisk in a tsp. margarine, and adjust seasoning. Split chickens in half, pour pan juices over and serve.

Reducing calories at Passover

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The seder meal should be enjoyed, without worrying about extra calories or fat, says Fran Berkoff, outpatient dietitian at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"It is important to remember that Passover is a time when we eat special foods, and we should do that for the two seder meals," says Berkoff.

The rest of the week, she says, is when we should concentrate on fruits and vegetables. "We do not get grains, so we need the fruits and vegetables for fibre," she said.

During the day, before the seder, Berkoff advises, "do not starve yourself. Have a regular eating day, and try to take a long walk the day after the seder.

"See the seder as two isolated meals. It is not the big picture. We all have days when we eat too much; balance yourself the rest of the week," says Berkoff.

Reducing fat can be done easily during the week of Passover, she says. "We usually use more than we need. Experiment with a dish, such as fried matzah or matzah meal pancakes, and cut down on the fat."

Concentrate on what you can eat, not on what you can't, she says. Salads, vegetables, gefilte fish, turkey – these are all part of healthy living. You can even put extra vegetables into your chicken soup.

The following recipes from the New York Times Passover Cookbook, go along with some of Berkoff's suggestions.

VEGETABLE GRATIN (pareve)

1 small eggplant, halved lengthwise, then sliced crosswise
2 small yellow squash, thinly sliced crosswise
2 tbsp. coarse salt
4 carrots, peeled and thinly sliced
1 medium onion, finely chopped
2 cloves garlic, finely chopped
1 tsp. tomato paste
¼ cup white wine
1 medium tomato, thinly sliced
1 yellow bell pepper, seeded, deveined and sliced lengthwise into ½-inch strips
1 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 red bell pepper, seeded, deveined and sliced lengthwise into ½-inch strips
1 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme
2 tbsp. olive oil
6 sprigs parsley, stems removed, finely chopped

Preheat the oven to 375. Lightly cover the eggplant and squash slices with the salt and set aside for 30 minutes. Rinse the slices under cold running water and pat them dry. Put the carrots, onion and garlic in a large skillet with a heavy bottom. In a small bowl, dissolve the tomato paste in the white wine and pour it over the carrots. Stir to combine. Arrange the eggplant, tomato, yellow pepper, squash and red pepper, in that order, in alternating rows on top of the carrot mixture. The sliced vegetables should be loosely packed. Sprinkle the thyme over the gratin (casserole) and season with the black pepper. Drizzle with the olive oil, cover the pan with foil and bake for 45 minutes. Remove the foil and continue to bake for an additional 30 minutes. Garnish with parsley. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

ANNE ROSENZWEIG'S BUTTERNUT SQUASH RATATOUILLE

2 medium butternut squash, peeled, halved, fibres scooped out and cut into ¾-inch cubes
3 tsp. vegetable oil
1 cup carrots, peeled and cut into ¼-inch dice
1 cup leeks, cleaned and cut into ¼-inch dice
1 cup zucchini, cut into ¼-inch dice
1 cup golden delicious apples, peeled, cored and cut into ¼-inch dice
½ cup minced shallots
1 cup vegetable broth
2 tsp. salt
Freshly ground pepper

Preheat oven to 375. Place squash in a roasting pan and toss with 2 tsp. oil. Roast until just tender, tossing from time to time, about 25 minutes. Heat the remaining tsp. of oil in a large, nonstick skillet over moderately high heat. Add the roasted squash and carrots and cook for 3 minutes, stirring occasionally. Add the leeks and cook for 2 minutes, stirring occasionally. Add zucchini, apples and shallots and cook for 3 minutes longer, stirring occasionally. Stir in the vegetable broth and salt and pepper to taste, and simmer until the vegetables are tender but not too soft, about 15 minutes. Serve warm. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

Passover meals don't have to be heavy

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

For most people, the notion of a light seder meal may be a bit of an oxymoron. After all, light fare is hardly synonymous with Passover cooking.

Cooking maven Bonnie Stern, author of the HeartSmart Cooking series, recalls that the traditional seder meals at her home tended to be "heavy, but delicious. I liked it because it was celebration sort of time." However, she say's there's no reason why non-seder Passover meals have to be heavy.

"Everybody complains. I think you have to eat a lot of fresh fruit and vegetables to balance the matzah. And try not to eat too much of it. People seem to eat more matzah than they do bread."

Her own favourite Passover meal as a child was chopped egg salad on matzah. Her children, who are 14 and 16, enjoy matzah brei (fried matzah) and bubalach – matzah meal pancakes. "My mother's were never heavy and so mine aren't heavy."

Stern says she keeps her bubalach light by folding in beaten egg whites, but she notes that not everyone can use this technique because some people won't beat egg whites during Passover.

Bubalach and matzah brei are more family fare and not the type of dishes one would serve guests. Stern recommends serving smoked salmon to company during Passover and she also offered some recipes from her newest cookbook Heart-Smart Cooking for Family and Friends (Random House).

Stern's says her gefilte fish loaf, which is baked, is very easy to make."It's a wonderful light meal you can eat with a salad or matzah for supper.

"When you buy really fresh fish and you bake it, it doesn't smell as much as if you're cooking on top of a stove…I make gefilte fish loaf all the time."

As for Passover desserts, Stern says hosts can keep this last course light by serving fresh fruit, compote or sorbets. "I like a meringue dessert. I like meringue cup with sorbet or caramelized winter fruit for a non-dairy meal."

GEFILTE FISH LOAF

3 lb. mixed ground fish (such as 1½ lb. whitefish, 1 lb. pickerel and ½ lb. salmon)
3 eggs
1 cup cold water
⅓ cup matzah meal
4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper
1 tbsp. granulated sugar
1 small onion grated (¼ to ⅓ cup)
1 carrot, grated chopped (about 1 cup)

Place fish in large bowl. Add eggs, water, matzah meal, salt, pepper, sugar, onion and carrot. Gently combine ingredients together.

Place mixture in a 9 x 5-inch/ 2-lb. loaf pan lined with parchment paper. Cover with foil. Place a roasting pan in a preheated 350 oven and half fill the pan with hot or boiling water. Gently place pan of fish in water bath. Bake for 1 hour. Uncover pan and bake 30 minutes longer.

Cool fish and then refrigerate for a few hours or overnight. Remove from pan and slice. Serve with horse radish. Makes 12 to 16 servings.

RUSSIAN BEET AND POTATO SALAD

"The colour and taste of this salad are awesome," says Stern. "Serve it as an appetizer or a side dish."

1 English cucumber
1 tsp. salt
1 lb. beets, cooked, peeled and diced (about 3)
1 lb. potatoes, cooked, peeled and diced (about 3 large)
3 hard-cooked egg whites, diced
1 dill pickle, diced
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
2 tbsp. chopped fresh chives or green onions
1 cup of yogurt cheese, thick yogurt, or light sour cream
2 tbsp. mayonnaise
1 tbsp. of horseradish
Salt and pepper to taste

Cut cucumber in half lengthwise. Scoop out seeds. Dice cucumber. Place in a colander, toss with salt and allow to drain for 30 minutes. Rinse cucumber well to remove salt and pat dry.

In a large bowl, combine cucumber, beets, potatoes, egg whites, pickle, dill, parsley and chives.

In a small bowl, combine yogurt cheese, mayonnaise, and horseradish. Taste, add salt and pepper if necessary.

Toss yogurt mixture with salad. Makes 8 servings.

Yogurt cheese

Line a large strainer with cheesecloth, paper towel or coffee filter and set over a bowl. Place 3 cups unflavoured lowfat natural yogurt in a strainer and allow to rest for 3 hours or up to overnight in refrigerator. About half the volume of yogurt will strain out as liquid. (The longer the yogurt sits the thicker it becomes). Spoon thickened yogurt cheese into a container, cover and refrigerate. Use as required. Makes 1½ cups.

A kosher and healthy Pesach possible for diabetics

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

With a pinch of creativity and a dash of planning, those with diabetes can enjoy a Pesach holiday that is both kosher and healthy, according to dietician Alison Weinstein.

True, the four glasses of wine, the karpas and the maror have religious and symbolic significance, but "does that mean we have to also consume chocolate, 40 eggs, and puddings?" she asked.

Weinstein was speaking at the annual Passover program of the Jewish Diabetes chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association. She read a speech prepared by fellow dietician Sharon Gottlieb, who was unable to attend.

The healthy eating principles that diabetics observe all year long, especially limiting the intake of sugar, salt, fat and alcohol, are the same during Pesach, said Weinstein.

She explained that the new philosophy of healthy eating emphasizes the importance of a variety of foods – including whole grains and low-fat dairy products – eating in moderation, and spacing meals.

Concentrate on fresh foods, she advised. There are many kosher for Passover foods available, and those from the United States offer extensive nutritional information. However, Weinstein said, be careful about, for instance, the labelling on mixes.

"The information given for two matzah balls, [says] to add 11 grams of carbohydrates, six of fat and three of proteins to [allow] for the extra eggs, and milk or oil to make the mix."

Using egg whites and less oil will help lower these numbers, she said.

To make up the fibre that one usually gets from beans, rice, and grains, use whole wheat matzahs, and extra fibrous vegetables, such as broccoli, cabbage and asparagus.

Bake, roast or broil instead of frying, she suggested, and use spray instead of oil to grease pans.

Fat can be reduced by chilling soups and stews and skimming off the fat, serving gravies or sauces on the side, substituting two egg whites for one egg, juice or applesauce instead of fat, and sunflower or olive oil instead of cottonseed oil.

At the seder, use dry wine in small glasses, she said. Have a snack before the seder starts, to maintain blood sugar levels.

She also said to use coconut sparingly, and eat a lot of free vegetables.

Make yogurt cheese, Weinstein recommended. Buy yogurt without gelatin, and strain it through a coffee filter overnight, or for up to two days. When it thickens, add finely chopped vegetables, garlic, and salt and pepper. It becomes something like cream cheese.

The chapter gave out a number of Passover recipes suitable for diabetics. Here are a few examples.

NO-CRUST VEGETABLE QUICHE

2 cups cooked broccoli, well drained
2 tbsp. butter
1 tsp. oil
1 large onion, finely chopped
1 clove garlic, crushed
2 tomatoes, peeled and chopped
1 tsp. chopped parsley
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
3 eggs, well beaten
1 cup grated cheddar cheese

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a pie plate lightly. Add cooked vegetables. Melt butter with oil. Saute onion and garlic; add tomatoes, salt and pepper; cook 10 minutes. Cool. Pour over vegetables in a pie plate. Pour beaten eggs over vegetables. Sprinkle with grated cheese. Bake about 30 minutes, or until knife inserted in the centre comes out clean. Serves 6.

Each serving, one-sixth of the pie, is 2 protein choices, half a fruit & vegetable choice and 2 fats & oils choices.

FROZEN STRAWBERRY SOUFFLE

Pick over, hull and clean 4 cups fresh strawberries. Reserve 6 berries for garnish. Puree remaining berries in blender or food processor with ½ cup sugar.

In a very large mixing bowl, beat together 2 egg whites and 2 tbsp. lemon juice.

Gradually add ½ cup sugar and, if you wish, a little brandy, and beat until stiff peaks form. Fold berry mixture into egg white mixture. Beat continuously at high speed till double in volume, about 10 minutes. Pour into glass serving bowl, cover and freeze at least 24 hours.

Remove from freezer 15 minutes before serving and garnish with reserved berries. Serves 20.

1 serving of ½ cup is 50 calories, 5 g protein, 1 g fat and 12 g carbohydrates.

BLUEBERRY MUFFINS

¼ cup sugar
¼ tsp. salt
½ cup cake meal
2 cups frozen blueberries
½ cup oil
¼ cup potato starch
3 eggs

Sift salt, potato starch and cake meal. Mix oil and sugar, add eggs and beat well. Fold in dry ingredients. Fold in blueberries. Pour into paper cups in muffin tins. Sprinkle cinnamon on top. Bake at 325 for 40-50 minutes. Yield: 12 muffins.

One muffin is 1 starch choice, half a fruit & vegetable choice, and 2 fat choices.

Correction

The food story, "CJN staff share Passover favorites," contained an incorrect amount in the ingredients list. The recipe for Honeyed Sweet Potato Casserole calls for 2 tablespoons of margarine. The CJN regrets the error.

Kosher lunch now available at Mount Sinai Hospital

TORONTO — The search for a kosher lunch in the downtown core recently became much simpler when Mount Sinai Hospital held a grand opening for a new kosher specialty section in its cafeteria.

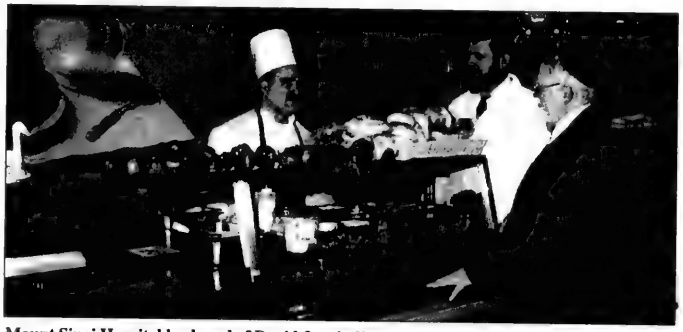
"We decided to take some space in the cafeteria and...offer hot, ready-made and freshly prepared meal options," said the hospital's director of nutrition and food services, Joy Langlois. "The service was developed in response to inquiries from hospital staff and volunteers for warm kosher lunches."

"We are very proud to offer this service for the people who use the hospital," said Mount Sinai Hospital chief operating officer and executive vice-president Joseph Mapa. "It has special meaning because of our roots and our unabated commitment to the Jewish community."

Prior to the opening of the hospital's new kosher specialty section, the hospital was providing convenient kosher meal options produced by outside suppliers, and did offer occasional theme days where warm food items such as pizza or soup were offered.

The new kosher menu includes cabbage borscht, blintzes, vegetarian lasagna and sushi. A variety of salads and sandwiches are also available on a daily basis.

The cafeteria is open on weekdays between 11 a.m. and 2:15 p.m.



Mount Sinai Hospital kosher chef David Jenah discusses menu options with the mashgiach, Rabbi Moshe Ginz and hospital chaplain, Rabbi Bernard Schulman during the opening of the hospital's new kosher specialty section.

Premium kosher wines in time for Passover

Royal Wine Corporation has introduced the first premium kosher wines from Australia, as well as wines from Chile, Italy, France, Israel and California, in time for Passover.

Both Baron Herzog and Golan Heights Winery were invited to participate in the 1999 New York Wine Experience, and Baron Herzog's 1998 Chenin Blanc was the winner of the 1999 West Coast Wine Competition's "Sweepstakes Award – White Wine."

Royal Wine Corporation's newest addition to its kosher wine offerings is Teal Lake. This new line of Australian wines includes the 1999 Teal Lake Shiraz and 1999 Chardonnay, which were produced at the well-respected Normans Winery in South Australia.

Both wines are made in the traditional Australian fruit-forward style. The Shiraz exhibits notes of spice typical of the varietal, and the Chardonnay is a clean fruity wine with notes of butter and a rich flavour.

Another new offering from Royal is the 1999 Alfasi Chardonnay, which along with the 1998 Alfasi Merlot and 1998 Cabernet, is produced from vineyards in Chile's Maule Valley, 160 miles south of Santiago. Alfasi, made at Chile's Carta Vieja Winery, enjoyed a very successful debut last year with its 1997 Merlot and 1997 Cabernet.

Baron Herzog, the super premium kosher winery in Santa Maria, Calif., is introducing new vintages of a number of its wines in time for Passover, including the full-bodied 1997 Old Vines Zinfandel from Lodi, 1998 Chardonnay, 1999 White Zinfandel and 1998 Chenin Blanc from Clarksburg.

Also available in time for Passover is the impressive 1998 Cabernet Sauvignon. The 1997 vintage of Baron Herzog's Cabernet was awarded a gold medal at the 1999 West Coast Wine Competition, and winemaker Peter Stern says the 1998 is an even better wine.

Royal also imports a full line of wines produced in France and Italy. The Herzog selection from France provides a taste of a line of French wines at reasonable prices. Current releases are the 1998 Herzog selection Merlot, 1998 Herzog selection Cabernet Sauvignon and 1999 Herzog selection Chardonnay, all of which are made from 100 percent French grapes.

The Chateau Yon Figeac in the St. Emilion region of Bordeaux also produces a kosher wine, and the 1995 vintage is presently available. From Italy, new offerings include Bartenura's delicate Moscato d'Asti and the 1998 Barbera d'Asti.

Royal is also introducing several new vintages from Israel's Yarden and Gamla, which are made at the Golan Heights Winery. The winery is located more than 4,000 feet above sea level in the Golan Heights region.

Yarden was recently awarded a silver medal at the 1999 VinExpo on the strength of its 1997 Cabernet, 1997 Merlot and 1998 Sauvignon Blanc, all of which are currently available nationwide. Gamla, Yarden's sister brand, will also be releasing its 1997 Cabernet and 1997 Chardonnay in time for Passover.

"With the addition of Teal Lake this year and Alfasi last year, kosher wines are now made in almost all of the world's most important wine growing regions.

"Our wines are now distributed in virtually every market in the United States, as well as throughout Canada, Israel, South America, Europe, Asia, Africa and Australia," said Nathan Herzog, vice-president of Royal Wine Corporation.

Feature

Salomon exhibit starts on April 14

Painted in the three primary colours, the work contains allusions to the fine arts, literature, music and her own life, which was suffused with sadness and sorrow.

Salomon was murdered in Auschwitz in 1943 when she was four months pregnant. Her husband, Alexander Nagler, also perished in that camp.

Critics, having observed that Salomon's drawings are both sophisticated and naive and cannot be categorized easily in modernist terms, have compared her with Vincent van Gogh and Marc Chagall.

Michael Parke-Taylor, associate curator of European Art at the Art Gallery of Ontario, believes that Salomon was a major talent.

"She is important on various levels, not least as a virtually unknown female artist painting works of consequence during the events of World War II," he said in an interview.

"The fact that her work survived is remarkable. The exhibition attempts to bring her into the canon of art history, since the work is of merit, not for documentary reasons, but because it's artistically potent."

Parke-Taylor added that Salomon's drawings are bright and vibrant, and tell a compelling family story with all "the sadness and happiness that that entails. Thus, there is an element of empathy for the viewer.

"The work is testimony to the power of art to deal with trauma and fully realize what it means to be human."

Salomon's gouaches were first exhibited in Holland and subsequently in Switzerland and Israel.

אַן ערב־פסח אין באַגדאַד

(א קאַפּיטל פון זיין בוך „וואַסערן פון בבל")

Student leader inspired in Israel

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nadia Sapiro, president of the University of Western Ontario's Jewish Students Union, says she had second thoughts last December about her position in the JSU.

She was frustrated by what she saw as her inability to enact positive change on campus. "I had run dry. I had run out of the passion, the ideas that made me want to be a leader in the first place," she said.

On the last night of a Hillel International lay leadership conference March 25 to 27, Sapiro spoke about her Birthright Israel experience. Other student participants, Hillel professionals, lay leaders and Michael Steinhardt, who launched the program with Charles Bronfman, also spoke about their experiences.

The Birthright Israel program sent 6,000 young people from around the world to Israel for 10-day trips from December to February.

On this free trip to Israel, she had two experiences that made her realize the "why" behind it all and gave her motivation, she said.

Sapiro roomed with a young woman who grew up in a small town in Ontario, the only Jewish student in her class.

Sapiro remembers her room-mate bombarding her with questions: Why can't Jews drive on Saturday? Is this skirt long enough to wear to the Western Wall? Why do we wash our hands before we eat?

Sapiro answered her questions, but asked herself: How could she not know?

"It was then that I realized that being Jewish is not just about how much you know. It is about how much you are willing to admit that you don't know, and being brave enough to ask questions," she said.

The second inspirational experience, Sapiro said, came after her group heard a speech about the Western Wall. As the speech ended, her tour guide called out to the group that they should look out at Jerusalem.

Sapiro saw shimmering, white Jerusalem stone. As the sun began to set, the stone turned to radiant gold and her tour guide said: "This is why they call it Yerushalayim Shel Zahav – Jerusalem of Gold."

She later went to a pay phone and called her mother in Toronto to describe what she had just seen.

"If I ever forget why I do this or why being Jewish is important to me – please remind me of this," she told her mother.

Richard Joel, president and international director of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, also shared his experiences on the Birthright Israel trip.

He was speaking to a group of university students who were visiting the Western Wall, and they asked him how to put notes in the Wall and what they were supposed to feel.

He quoted from the song Ha Kotel, and told them there are men with hearts of stone but there are stones with hearts of people. He also reminded them that many of their ancestors had spent their lives yearning to touch the walls of the Kotel and they knew they never would.

When Michael Steinhardt arrived at Ben-Gurion airport in January and saw students from the former Soviet Union dancing with young people from the United States, he "began to see the reversal of decades of neglect and decline," he said.

During his speech at the conference, he also asked a compelling question: "Can we reverse half a century of assimilation in 10 days? Of course not," he said.

"In order for this process to take hold, we must continue to provide these students with more and more opportunities to experience Jewish joy."

Birthright Israel extended to 2004

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Israeli government and 14 philanthropists have agreed to fund five years of free trips to Israel.

In an interview with The CJN following a Hillel lay leadership conference in Toronto, Mark Charendoff, vice president of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies, spoke about Birthright Israel's five-year business plan.

The Birthright Israel initiative was launched this winter when 6,000 young people from Canada, the United States and 13 other countries including Chile, South Africa, England and France travelled to Israel. Michael Steinhardt and Charles Bronfman headed the project.

In the interview, Charendoff revealed that two-thirds of the funding for Birthright Israel trips from now until the year 2004 has been secured. The Israeli government has agreed to give $70 million; in addition, 14 philanthropists have agreed to give $5 million each.

Local Jewish communities around the world are Birthright Israel's third partner. Some communities have already agreed to fund the project.

"Funders are being recruited community by community," said Yitz Greenberg, president of Michael Steinhardt's philanthropic foundation, The Jewish Life Network.

Charendoff is optimistic that local communities will come through with funding.

"I'm hopeful that before the kids leave in May, we'll celebrate them as full partners."

In May, 118 young Canadians aged 25 and 26 will travel to Israel for free as part of the Birthright Israel program. This group, which has already been contacted, are people who were on waiting lists for Canada's February Birthright Israel trips. In July, 120 young Canadians aged 18 to 24, who were also on waiting lists, will travel to the holy land.

The trips will follow the same format as the 10-day trips in February, which included outings to major sites like Masada and the Western Wall and discussions with young Israelis.

Trips will follow the same format

"There may be some nuances here and there but we're keeping the same model," said Ivy Abrams, vice-president of marketing for Birthright Israel.

Birthright Israel staff may have a better understanding of changes which should be made once they view the results of a study Birthright Israel commissioned. The study, not yet released, was conducted by staff from the Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies at Brandeis University and a market research organization in New York City.

As part of the study, observers travelled with buses of Birthright Israel participants in January and February and took notes. A survey is being sent to winter participants to gauge the trip's success.

Charendoff says in the future, young people will have a larger variety of Birthright Israel trips to choose from. He says he would love to see an architecture tour of Israel or a trip to investigate medical ethics in Israel.

"We have to reach these kids with what is going to excite them," he said.

"I want to get the kids who are not interested in going but we make them such a remarkable offer that they can't resist going."

For the first time, Birthright Israel will be taking a group of twenty deaf American participants to Israel in the spring, he said.

While he cannot guarantee it, he also believes future Birthright trips will be free.

He admits that when planning the Birthright tours, he and several others were against providing free trips.

But Michael Steinhardt thought it should be free.

"Michael said there is a romance to this being a gift... and he was right."

According to Yitz Greenberg, this past winter's Birthright Israel trips were just the beginning.

Organizers of Birthright Israel hope that travelling to Israel will become a rite of passage all Jewish students expect to experience, he said.

"Our dream is someday, to travel and study in Israel will be as widespread a ritual as a bar mitzvah."

We need help setting border: Levy

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel wants international help to define its northern border and to establish an effective mechanism to keep the frontier peaceful after the IDF withdraws from southern Lebanon, Foreign Minister David Levy said recently.

Levy was speaking after meeting with the Netherlands Prime Minister Wim Kok.

"We have taken a decision to leave Lebanon and it is very important for international bodies to address the content of United Nations Security Council Resolution 425," Levy said, referring to the 1978 resolution that calls on Israel to leave Lebanon "forthwith" and for all other states to respect the "territorial integrity" of Lebanon.

Levy is expected to meet UN Secretary General Kofi Annan in Europe in the next few days. He will brief Annan on the Israeli withdrawal plan and solicit the support of the world body.

A political source in Jerusalem said recently that Israel is not suggesting the establishment or deployment of a new multinational force – in addition to or in place of UNIFIL.

The UN Interim Force in Lebanon was created by Resolution 425 (as well as by resolutions 426 and 427) to keep peace along the border.

The source said Israel is only asking the international community for support in implementing Resolution 425, the political and legal basis for the IDF to leave Lebanon.

Levy said Israel's moves toward the withdrawal might induce Syria to expedite the peace process, once Damascus understands that Israel is serious.

Levy lashed out at Syrian President Hafez al-Assad: "He resembles the Egyptian Sphinx, whose nose has been worn away by time and the winds, so it is difficult to identify it. Perhaps Assad's nose has also lost the sense of direction, but I hope good sense will ultimately guide him."

Syrian troops in Lebanon

Prime Minister Ehud Barak told the Dutch leader, "I would not suggest to anyone that they test our response by attacking Israeli territory after the [IDF] withdrawal, because then it will be clear that there is no legitimacy, justification or pretext for such attacks."

Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara said recently in Beirut that his country is not considering the option of deploying its forces in southern Lebanon following an Israeli withdrawal. The idea of a Syrian redeployment was recently broached by Lebanese Defence Minister Ghazi Zaiter.

Zaiter said that Lebanon might ask Syria to deploy its troops in the south of his country in case of a unilateral Israeli withdrawal.

"This [unilateral Israeli withdrawal] raises the possibility that the Lebanese government may ask Syria to send its troops to the south with the Lebanese army," Zaiter said.

"The aim of such a request is not to make Syria protect Israeli northern borders, but to put Tel Aviv in the range of Syrian rockets," he said. Syria has had some 35,000 troops in Lebanon since 1976.

Zaiter, considered to be a relative extremist within the Lebanese government, said he wanted to make it clear that this statement was just his personal opinion and not Lebanon's official policy.

He said this might be a workable response to Israeli proposals that suggested the replacement of Israeli troops with multinational or United Nations troops in the security zone it has occupied.

Prime Minister Barak's office refused to comment on Zaiter's statements over Israel's planned July withdrawal from Lebanon.

"This proposal [of Zaiter's] does not seem realistic or practical," said a political source in Jerusalem.

Meanwhile, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has formally informed Lebanon through the U.S. embassy in Beirut that in the aftermath of the recently failed Geneva summit between U.S. President Bill Clinton and Syrian President Assad, Israel plans to withdraw from Lebanon under the provisions of UN Resolution 425.

Neo-Nazis' numbers climbed sharply in Germany last year

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — The number of neo-Nazis in Germany climbed sharply in the last year, according to excerpts from a government report on the far-right published recently.

The Bild newspaper said the government study, that was to be released on Tuesday, found that membership in far-right groups had risen by about 11 percent to 53,600 in 1999 and that the number ready to commit violent crimes was up 9 percent to 8,200.

Germany's population is about 82 million, of whom around seven million are foreigners.

A spokesperson for the Interior Ministry, Rainer Lingenthal, declined to comment on the newspaper report. Interior Minister Otto Schily was due to present the study on Tuesday.

"Once again more neo-Nazis in Germany," read the headline on the report, which cited the study by the government's office for the protection of the constitution.

The report also found that there are 114 far-right groups in Germany and that they are increasingly making use of the Internet. It said that there are about 300 home pages for the far right.

Even though the far right largely disappeared from Germany at the end of the Nazi era in 1945, there has been an increase in right-wing extremist activities and crimes in the 10 years since Germany's unification in 1990.

One far-right party, the German People's Union (DVU), scored nearly 13 percent in a state election in the eastern state of Saxony-Anhalt two years ago.

There have been hundreds of attacks on foreigners living in Germany over the last decade. More than 30 foreigners have been killed by far-right extremists.

Political leaders, church groups and business leaders all recently condemned an election campaign slogan by former Technology Minister Juergen Ruettgers, who is running to be state premier in North Rhine-Westphalia next month.

Ruettgers is trying to stop the government's plans to grant visas for 20,000 computer specialists to fill jobs for which the industry said it could find no suitable applicants in Germany.

His slogan "Kinder Statt Inder" (Children instead of Indians) and "More training instead of more immigration" have been roundly criticized as a nod to far-right ideas.

Moscow to supply reactors to India and Iran

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Russian Atomic Power Minister Yevgeny Adamov said last Friday that Russia is finalizing contracts for constructing eight nuclear reactors in India and Iran, Interfax news agency reported.

A five-reactor deal with India should be closed around the start of next year, Adamov said at a ministry conference in the Russian town of Snezhinsk.

Tehran, meanwhile, is preparing to place orders for three more reactors at its atomic power plant at Bushehr, where Russian engineers are still building the first reactor, the minister said.

Russia's collaboration with Iran in this field has raised fears in the west about the proliferation of sensitive nuclear technology.

The Russian government has repeatedly rejected charges by the United States and Israel that it has been helping Iran develop a nuclear weapons program.

The Week in Israel

March 27
• The state prosecutor asked the court in Jerusalem to allow the extradition to Canada of Daniel Weisz, charged with participating in the beating death of Matty Baranovski. The judge is expected to rule on the matter April 10.

March 28
• The son of former Knesset member Ze'ev Begin and grandson of the late prime minister Menachem Begin was declared missing after the F16 plane he was piloting during a training flight crashed into the Mediterranean. Searches continued for Yonatan Begin and his navigator Lior Harrari. (The bodies were found the next day.)

March 29
• Danny Yatom, Prime Minister Ehud Barak's security advisor, vowed Israel would help its Christian militia allies in south Lebanon who fear revenge following Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon.

March 30
• Natan Sharansky, minister of the interior, announced he will travel to Ethiopia to learn more about the situation of the Falash Mura, descendants of Jews who converted to Christianity. The announcement follows upon a Supreme Court decision calling on Israel to expedite processing the 18,000 Ethiopians in Addis Ababa and Gondar hoping to get to Israel.

Government manoeuvre frustrates MiA lobbyists

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Seven years after Oslo, nine years after talks with Syria began, families of Israeli soldiers missing in action (MiA) still have no definitive information about their missing children.

Recently, the anger and frustration of one parent, Yona Baumel, was turned against the leader of his government, Prime Minister Ehud Barak, after the PM strong-armed members of his governing coalition to abandon support of a private member's bill on the MiAs. The bill would have prevented ratification of any future peace deal with Syria until the Arab government disclosed all the information it had about Israeli MiAs.

Baumel, whose son Zachary has been missing for more than 17 years, surprised Barak in the Knesset after the vote and berated him for his tactics.

Baumel "got within one inch of his nose and said it was an underhanded manoeuvre and a disgrace and beneath the dignity of the prime minister to pull that [manoeuvre] without informing the families and without giving any indication it was coming," said Danny Eisen, chair of the International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers (ICMIS), a group that lobbies on behalf of the MiAs.

Instead of a law that bound the government, the Knesset passed a non-binding resolution that said the government will make the MiAs a substantive issue during negotiations, Eisen said.

Barak may not have wanted to have his hands tied by a law, Eisen conceded, but he pointed out that "the Palestinians never hesitated at the start of negotiations [to bring up prisoners], that this is a red line issue for them.

"The Palestinians have made it a public issue and I think it's time Israel made it a public issue," he said.

ICMIS has for years worked to raise the public profile of the issue and to support the parents of four Israelis still believed to be held as prisoners. Three of the prisoners – Baumel, Yehuda Katz and Zvi Feldman – were captured in Lebanon in 1982 after a tank battle at Sultan Yakoub. A few hours later they were paraded through Damascus and seen by several foreign reporters and diplomats. Since then, the Syrians have claimed the three were dead. The fourth MiA is air force navigator Ron Arad, who was captured after he ejected from his Phantom over Lebanon in 1986. He reportedly has been traded between Palestinian factions and is now believed to be in Iran.

Eisen said Likud MK Danny Naveh had agreed to sponsor the MiA bill and ICMIS had succeeded in garnering the support of 61 MKs, including members of nine Knesset parties. Among them were parliamentarians from the Shas, Mafdal and Yisrael b'Aliyah parties, all members of the coalition government.

According to Eisen, on the day of the vote Barak "called in the party leaders, put them against the wall and demanded they withdraw support of the bill."

After much negotiation and many delays of the vote, the coalition partners backed down although head of Yisrael b'Aliyah, "[Natan] Sharansky put up a fight until he realized that with the loss of Shas and Mafdal, he couldn't win," Eisen said.

With defeat a real possibility, supporters of the bill were faced with a dilemma. If the bill went ahead and was defeated, it couldn't be reintroduced for six months. If it was withdrawn, it could be rescheduled for another vote in six weeks.

They chose the latter course and soon afterwards, Baumel confronted Barak.

David Cooper, press officer at the Israeli embassy in Ottawa, said the government was concerned it might limit Barak's manoeuvring room. "Going into negotiations, it didn't want its hands tied on any issue," he said. "The issue of MiAs is paramount and Israel raises it at every possible forum... All these issues are raised and brought into negotiations."

A recent poll in Israel showed that 75 percent of the population agrees that Syria must fully disclose all it knows about the MiAs before Israel ratifies any agreement, Eisen said.

ICMIS' fear is that "since the beginning of talks, both right-wing and left-wing governments have not had this as a priority." After years of negotiations with its Arab partners, all Israel has to show is half of Baumel's dog-tag, delivered by Yasser Arafat in December 1993.

"The families are concerned that negotiations go on and a deal will be struck with less than the fullest possible accounting," Eisen said.

ICMIS plans to ratchet up its publicity campaign "to push the [Israeli] coalition partners into a corner," he added.

In the meantime, he and Baumel are planning a trip to Ottawa before June during which he hopes to meet with Canadian politicians. Canada has a good reputation in the Mideast and it could use its influence to push the issue, Eisen said.

Mideast Analysis
By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Focusing on Palestinians

Prime Minister Ehud Barak can focus his attention on the Palestinian track now that President Bill Clinton has failed to revive Israel's suspended talks with Syria. At a three-hour meeting with Syrian President Hafez al-Assad on March 26 in Geneva, Clinton was unable to bridge the gaps in their respective positions. This effectively means that the prospects for an Israeli-Syrian peace treaty have dimmed, and that hopes for a serious resumption of final status talks with the Palestinians have correspondingly risen.

Barak had boasted of his acrobatic ability to juggle complex negotiations with Syria and the Palestine Authority (PA) simultaneously. But to their chagrin, the Palestinians discovered that Barak was so laser-focused on Syria and the Golan Heights that he put the Palestinian pot on the backburner.

With the setback in Geneva, Barak can now concentrate, to some degree at least, on advancing the Palestinian agenda. Yet as PA leader Yasser Arafat realizes, Barak will also be busy in the months ahead trying to fulfil an election campaign promise to withdraw from Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon by July, unilaterally if necessary.

Barak is committed to reaching a final status accord with the Palestinians this year, but he has yet to establish a relationship of trust with its leadership.

In the third week of March, Israeli and Palestinian representatives met at Bolling Air Force base, near Washington, D.C., for brainstorming talks on deal-breaking final status issues such as borders, Jewish settlements, Palestinian refugees, water rights and Jerusalem. But after a week, the negotiations ended without a breakthrough, foreshadowing the immense difficulties which still lie ahead. The talks are scheduled to resume on April 6.

Under the terms of the Sept. 5, 1999 Sharm el Sheik pact, Israel and the PA set target dates for three additional Israeli redeployments from the West Bank and the implementation of framework and final status agreements. On Sept. 10 and Jan. 4, Israel made two withdrawals of seven percent and five percent from Areas B and C. As well, Israel inaugurated a southern safe passage route from the West Bank to the Gaza Strip, allowed the Palestinians to open an airport and a seaport in Gaza, and released a number of Palestinian prisoners.

But in a Feb. 3 summit, Barak and Arafat failed to find a formula for the third redeployment,which should have been carried out on Jan. 20, or for a framework agreement, due on Feb. 13. The PA froze talks.

At the urging of the PA, American mediators, led by Dennis Ross, stepped in. Subsequently, Barak and Arafat announced a date for a third redeployment of six percent (which took place on March 21), and pledged to hammer out a framework accord by May and a final status agreement no later than Sept. 13.

In addition, Barak and Arafat have discussed the scope and timing of yet another Israeli withdrawal. Under the Oslo accords, Israel is obliged to cede all land in the West Bank, other than Jewish settlements and "defined military sites," to the Palestinians.

By their interpretation, the Palestinians are entitled to 90 percent of it. The PA currently controls or partially administers roughly 40 percent, claiming that Israel is withholding 125 square miles around the Dead Sea, Jerusalem and the Latrun salient.

At a minimum, Barak wants to retain Jewish settlement blocs, comprising 10 percent to 15 percent of its territory, and probably much more.

In a trial balloon last month, Barak offered the PA 50 percent of the West Bank on the understanding that Israel would immediately annex 10 percent and negotiate over the rest. The PA rejected that overture, and Arafat is still threatening to declare unilateral statehood on Sept. 13. Clearly, matters are far from settled, and meanwhile, Palestinian frustration mounts by the day.

Eat well and spend less!

By Lorna Davis

The first question I asked Richard Zigelstein, owner of Mister EAT-WELL, was "Why would you open a butcher shop and deli when there is a store close by that has the same product and service?" He smiled and answered, "They don't. I'm here to offer a very specialized service for people who enjoy eating well without having to spend more."

Richard Zigelstein

At the fresh meat counter, Richard prides himself on the fine cuts, which he prepares himself. "I come from a long line of butchers. I learned the art very young. Even my great-grandmother was a butcher.

"The quality of meat is very important. I personally go to different suppliers and select only the best beef available."

Turning to the meat counter, you'll discover plump shish-ka-bobs and souvlaki, which are skewered, awaiting a hot BBQ.

For those who like it hot, Richard says, "People rave about my pepper steaks and pepper burgers."

Moving to the deli counter, there's a large selection of cold meats with high quality labels. To name just a few, Richard carries Kwinters, Hebrew National, Chicago 58, and Lesters from Montreal. Mister EAT-WELL also carries a large variety of salads and BBQ chickens, which are great for a take-out lunch or supper treat.

Now for those who enjoy true deli, there's fresh lox, cream cheese, chopped liver, knishes, potato latkes, kishka, egg rolls, smoked fish, and many more mouth-watering delights.

And, ah, yes, they carry fresh chalah, rye breads, buns, and fabulous desserts.

You can visit their other location in cottage country at the 400 Flea Market (Hwy. 400 & Innisfil Beach Rd.) every Saturday and Sunday.

The difference between eating and eating well, is the reason you will go to Mister EAT-WELL, located at the corner of Bathurst St. and Atkinson Ave. (the 1st set of lights north of Centre St.) and go back time and time again for more delicious treats.

Family-run Furrier Provides 'Full-service' Care

Kahnert Furs on Avenue Road is a family-run business that has been serving the Greater Metropolitan Toronto area since 1957.

"We have always been known as a 'full service' furrier where customers can expect professional, knowledgeable, and personal advice on restyling, alterations, cleaning and repairs," says Dan Kahnert, the 4th generation of the family business.

During the hot summer months, he stresses that cold fur storage is essential to prevent the premature drying of the pelts and to preserve the natural oils in the skin. Cedar closets and air-conditioned homes simply lack the necessary cold temperatures, the proper humidity levels, and an adequate circulation of air.

At storage time, every fur is examined by one of the family, and should any repairs need attending to, free estimates are provided. It is important to look after any small repairs early on so that further damage is avoided.

Over the course of a dirty winter, furs can accumulate dust, grime, and dirt and therefore require a professional fur cleaning. Kahnert recommends that furs should be cleaned once a year or at least every 2 years. This special cleaning process is an effective, preventative measure that will add years of beauty and life to your furs while restoring their natural lustre and silkiness.

You may also take advantage of their trade-in policy. Kahnerts will allow you up to an additional 15% off the Spring Sales prices on any new purchase when you trade in your outdated fur.

They offer a quality selection of Canada Majestic Mink, Sheared Beaver, Canadian Lynx, Sable, "Sheared" Mink, Raccoon, Beaver, and Muskrat, in a wide range of styles, lengths, and prices.

Their selection of top quality (shearling) lamb apparel and fur trimmed cashmere round out their very unique and diverse product mix.

Kahnert Furs is located at 1702 Avenue Road (north of Lawrence) and can be reached at (416) 781-8472.

For spring footwear, invest in the best: MEPHISTO!

At last, spring has returned. The sun shines brighter, longer, warmer; the trees show their first green. And the more you enjoy spring, the more time you'll want to spend outdoors.

What better time to buy comfortable, durable spring and summer footwear? Today, shoes; tomorrow, sandals.

Whatever the purpose, invest in the best. You're on your feet all day; even when you sit, they bear some weight. If you're able to go barefoot in the park all day long, we want to know your secret; otherwise, you'll need the absolute best protection and support. The state of your feet, which affects posture and circulation, is integral to your overall health.

Enter Mephisto.

In 1965, in Sarrebourg, France, Martin Michaeli founded Mephisto with 30 employees. Today, 1,800 employees hand-craft 16,000 pairs of shoes daily; 15,000 stores carry Mephisto in over 40 countries; and 220 Mephisto concept stores bring customers the latest styles and designs.

Entrepreneur of the year

In 1999, L'Entreprise, France's leading business magazine, chose Michaeli from 11,000 independent French business people as Entrepreneur of the Year. And at a Palm Springs conference, CNN and Investor's Business Daily honoured him as one of the world's top entrepreneurs.

Mephisto's success is built on quality. Handmade from the best leathers and other natural materials, Mephisto shoes, boots, and sandals offer durability and comfort for work, play or formal wear. And they're guaranteed waterproof and breatheable for one year.

The women's collection combines fashionable elegance, state-of-the-art fit, and comfort. The sandals, designed with special respect for the anatomy of a woman's foot, are light, soft and stable.

Both men's and women's footwear have Air-Bag heel shock-absorbers and Air-Jet ventilation. Other features include latex foam cushioned soles for healthy walking, genuine leather inner sole, and padded toplines for ankle comfort.

Mephisto's Spring / Summer collection offers a wonderful selection of sandals, from stylish dresswear to sturdy walkers. Both men's and women's sandals combine lightness, airiness and the orthopedic comfort of an anatomical footbed.

Doulas provide support during childbirth

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Rivka Cymbalist knows she has done her job well when a woman who has just given birth and her partner feel satisfied with the experience.

The family has been given a good start.

Cymbalist is a doula, a trained woman who provides continuous emotional support and physical comfort to a woman during labour and delivery.

The relationship usually begins much earlier, during the sixth month of the pregnancy, when Cymbalist prepares the mother for what to expect and offers information on options to ease childbirth.

A doula is not a midwife, although Cymbalist also trained in midwifery. Her role is to complement others on the maternity care team, be they midwives, doctors and/or nurses. She provides a human element to care that has become increasingly reliant on technology.

Ideally, the doula is also there to provide reassurance to the father and work with him as well, if he is present.

Doulas do not offer medical advice or perform clinical tasks. Doulas encourage the labouring woman and comfort her through such means as relaxation techniques, or just holding her hand.

"With a doula, a woman is never left alone throughout labour and birth," Cymbalist said.

Doulas are little known in Quebec, although they have become commonplace in many parts of North America.

The Doulas of North America (DONA), the Washington State-based nonprofit organization that trains and certifies doulas, was founded in 1992 and today has 2,800 members.

Cymbalist is one of about 20 doulas in Montreal, and the only Jewish one.

One of the goals of DONA is to train women from many ethnic and religious backgrounds so that doulas are available who understand different cultural sensitivities.

The majority of Cymbalist's clients are, like herself, Orthodox. This community has taken to the doula concept quite naturally because it has a tradition of women assisting each other at childbirth. Also, it is not customary for husbands to be in the delivery room, so a doula is a welcome presence.

Cymbalist, the mother of four children aged eight to 16, recently returned to Montreal after living in Ontario where she was a volunteer doula at St. Joseph's Hospital in London.

"Doula is almost a household word in Ontario," she said.

Though doulas are new here, she has found doctors and nurses are more open to her role and less likely to see the doula as an interloper than in Ontario.

"I've found no resistance among doctors or nurses here. That's probably because hospitals here work on a shoestring. They see us as providing help that's needed."

Even under the best of circumstances, health professionals don't have the time to give the mother their total attention, she said.

Doula is an ancient Greek word meaning "woman's servant." Modern doulas see themselves as "supportive companions."

In Montreal, Cymbalist is a private doula. Women engage her services, for a set fee. She is also a volunteer doula for Alternative Naissance, which provides doula services to women who can't afford it. Often they are very young single women.

Cymbalist will typically have three prenatal visits with an expectant woman, either at her home or Cymbalist's. The father may also be involved.

"If it's the first baby, she will have many questions. If she's had a baby before, the birth may not have been so good. She will have to work out her fears. Pregnant women always have some fear, just different types," she said.

Cymbalist doesn't hide the fact that labour and birth are going to hurt, even with an epidural. She will talk about non-pharmaceutical ways to relieve pain and anxiety – things like breathing, visualization, taking showers, aromatherapy, massage, hot or cold compresses, or positioning. Cymbalist may bring a birth ball with her to the hospital, which the woman can sit or lean on.

"Some doctors are worried that we are only promoting alternative therapies and that we are competing with standard medicine. That is not the case," Cymbalist said.

"We present all the facts and the mother makes up her own mind. We encourage her to go to her doctor for medical advice. We don't make decisions for her."

Right until after the delivery, Cymbalist will explain to the mother what is going on.

Cymbalist is at the hospital as soon as the woman in labour arrives, and stays until about 1½ hours after the birth.

The benefits of doulas have been recognized by the Canadian Society of Obstetricians and Gynecologists.

Cymbalist said studies collected by DONA have shown there are fewer difficulties associated with births where a doula has been present, quicker bonding between mother and newborn, and less likelihood of postpartum depression.

These studies indicate labour is shorter, fewer Caesarean sections are performed, and less pain relief is requested.

"How the mother feels about the birth will have an effect on her emotional ties with the baby," Cymbalist said.

Rabbis differ on organ donations

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is a wide range of opinion among Toronto rabbis about whether Jews should donate their organs for transplant, says Rabbi Ronald Weiss.

Rabbi Weiss, director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family & Child Service and chaplain for the Jewish Hospice Program, was speaking as part of a panel in the Healthy Living series sponsored by Mount Sinai Hospital at Leah Posluns Theatre.

"There is a plethora of opinions on this subject, even within groups. For example, in the Orthodox rabbinate, there is a difference of opinion on when it is possible. Even those who say no also allow there are times to approve it."

There is "tremendous controversy" among Orthodox rabbis about whether brain stem death should be considered sufficient to allow for a donation, he said.

The rate of organ donations has decreased in Ontario in the past 15 years, said panelist Brian Flood, vice-chair of the Premier's Advisory Board on Organ and Tissue Donation.

But in that time the waiting list has shot up, he added.

The total number of donations in 1998 was 368, including living donors who donated a kidney, he said.

"It would be easy to blame the government and the hospitals, but we can't do that. By the year 2005, we are determined to double the rate of donations. The premier has asked that we present a plan to do that by March 31."

Since next of kin must agree to an organ donation, Flood said, audience members should discuss the subject with their families.

In discussing other issues, Rabbi Weiss said doctors should spend more time explaining to family members that "Do not resuscitate" orders are meant to protect patients from injury if resuscitation is tried.

A change in legislation is needed to protect the jobs of caregivers who are looking after terminally ill patients, said Dr. Larry Librach, director of the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Although Ontario has one of the best programs of home care in Canada, Librach said, the total of nine percent of a total budget of $19.4 billion for health care has not increased with the need, as more people are being cared for in their homes.

A living will should be made by everyone and given to your family physician and members of your family, said Dr. Christine Harrison, director of bioethics, the Hospital for Sick Children.

The will should be reduced in size by photocopying and carried around at all times in wallet size, she said.

The meeting was co-sponsored by the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the Jewish Women's Federation.

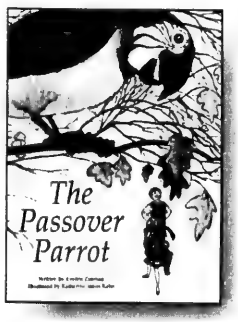
Passover Parrot

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For kids, one of the best parts of the Pesach seder is finding the afikoman. Everyone watches the leader of the seder as he hides the afikoman, tries to see where it is, and sneak it away before anyone else does.

What happens, though, if the afikoman is found not by one of the people at the seder, but by a pet? After all, an animal doesn't understand that the seder can't continue without it.

That's the problem that Leba Cohen has to deal with in The Passover Parrot, by Evelyn Zusman, with illustrations by Katherine Janus Kahn (Kar-Ben Copies, 1983, newly illustrated 1999).



Leba lived in a beautiful brownstone (that's a tall, narrow townhouse) in Brooklyn, with her parents and six brothers and sisters. One day, her next-door neighbour gives her a parrot. The Cohens name him Hametz, because they got him while they were cleaning for Pesach.

Leba decides that she will learn to say the Four Questions in Hebrew. The only one who will listen to her practise is Hametz. Naturally, being a parrot, he learns to sing them along with her.

The seder finally comes, and Leba, with the help of her brothers, finds the afikoman and hides it in her room. When she goes to get it, it is gone. And so is Hametz.

How do you think Leba manages to get the afikoman back?

The Passover Parrot is a really funny story about Pesach, and you will enjoy it very very much.

Making Passover fun

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Following the seder service can be really hard for kids. Not only does it start very late, but it goes on for a very long time. Sometimes the person who leads the service forgets that kids (and many adults!) have trouble following.

That is why there are special haggadahs for young people, that tell the story of Passover in simpler words, and often have lovely pictures to look at.

My favorite this year is Uncle Eli's Special-For-Kids, Most Fun Ever, Under-the-Table Passover Haggadah, by Eliezer Segal, with illustrations by Bonnie Gordon-Lucas (No Starch Press, 1999).

It tells the story of Pesach in rhymes, in the style of the Dr. Seuss books. Here are some examples:

We have to get rid of the hametz today
We have to destroy it.
We can't let it stay.
We'll punch it and crunch it and bury it deep, or leave it to rot
on Mount Zeepleep-the-Steep.

There was blood in the gutters and frogs in the butter, and lice on their heads,
and beasts in their beds,
disease in the cattle, and big boils in the saddle.

There is also,

Hillel, while the Temple stood, made sandwiches he thought were good.
They had no jam or mozzarelly
tuna fish or vermicelli just matzah, maror, and some kind of meat.

Bedikat Hametz

בדיקת חמץ

We have to get rid of the hametz today—
We have to destroy it.
We can't let it stay.

The pictures are really funny too.

Another one you will enjoy is My Very Own Haggadah; a seder service for young children, by Judyth Groner and Madeline Wikler, with illustrations by Sally Springer (Kar-Ben Copies, 3rd edition, 1999). There are lots of pictures, not just about the seder, but about preparing for Pesach too.

There is something different about this haggadah, though. You have to colour the pictures in yourself before the holiday begins. You might like to colour things in the way they are supposed to be, or even make it really funky, say with purple frogs, or blue trees, or yellow matzah.

There are also poems, recipes, songs, and crafts, like how to make your own seder plate, place-mats or matzah cover.

THE FOUR QUESTIONS

It's that time of year when, once again, we ask ourselves these very important questions:

1. What am I going to cook for the seder dinner?
2. Which night do we have to spend with his side of the family?
3. How can I fit 22 people around the dining room table?
4. What are the kids going to wear?

We have some suggestions to help you with the first 3 questions. We have the answer to the fourth!!

Mandel headlines ICRF gala

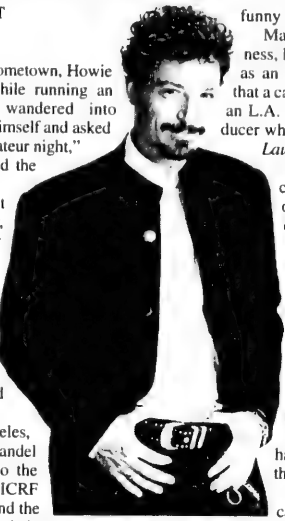
By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On a 1998 visit to his hometown, Howie Mandel discovered a comedy club while running an errand for his mother, Evy. He wandered into Comedywood in Thornhill, introduced himself and asked if he could perform. "Come back on amateur night," he was told – until someone recognized the well-known comic behind his goatee.

He can expect a warmer welcome next week. Mandel will be here on Thursday, April 13, to headline the Israel Cancer Research Fund's Gala 2000 at the Hummingbird Centre. The evening is dedicated to the memory of scriptwriter and comedian Marjorie Gross, who died of ovarian cancer.

"This [cause] is kind of near and dear to me," said Mandel, whose father, Albert, a Toronto businessman, also died of cancer.

Speaking by phone from Los Angeles, where he has lived for two decades, Mandel said he was especially motivated to do the benefit when he learned how advanced ICRF research is, and that it helps people around the world. He also remembers Gross from their days at Yuk Yuk's as "a great stand-up and a funny person."



Howie Mandel

Mandel, 44, never aspired to be in show business, he said. Although he'd done stand-up here as an amateur, it wasn't until a 1979 vacation that a career opportunity arose. Taking the mike at an L.A. club on a dare, he was noticed by a producer who booked him for a show called Make Me Laugh.

After Mandel returned to his Toronto carpet business, he received more offers, one of which led to a stint as Diana Ross' opening act.

Since then he has played Dr. Wayne Fiscus on the medical drama St. Elsewhere, created and served as executive producer of the children's series Bobby's World, launched an award-winning series of children's educational CD-ROMs, and hosted the Howie Mandel Show, a daily television talk show, from 1998 to 1999. His movie career includes the voice of Gizmo in Gremlins.

"I love that I found this career where I haven't been pigeonholed," he said. "I have the attention span of a gnat."

Most recently, Mandel completed a film called Spin Cycle, which has not yet been released. With his head shaved for the role, he said he looks "like a Jewish Mr. Clean" (a picture can be seen on his web site, http://www.howiemandel.com).

An alumnus of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am's Hebrew School and no less than three Toronto high schools (Northview Heights Secondary School, Georges Vanier Secondary School and Newtonbrook Secondary School), Mandel now makes a career out of "everything I've been expelled for."

He grew up in the Bathurst/Finch area, celebrated his bar mitzvah at Beth David, and met his wife Terry at the BBYO House (now the B'nai Brith building) on Hove Street.

He and Terry, a boutique owner, have been married 20 years, and have three children, age 7, 10 and 15.

Nothing changes a person like becoming a parent, Mandel said. "Children teach you much more than you teach them. They teach you patience, priority, what the world and humanity and everything is all about."

His act, he noted, is not for children. His own kids have seen "bits and pieces" of his edited comedy specials and picked up items not intended for their ears. "I've had to sit them down and explain to them, 'Don't you ever, ever talk the way Daddy does – unless it's paying the mortgage.'"

Bible-based play offers picture of family dysfunction

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

Anton Piatigorsky's latest theatrical offering borrows from Genesis.

In The Offering, he has taken three biblical tales and given them an unexpected twist.

With a degree in religious studies from Brown University, Piatigorsky is at home in biblical territory. Using the Bible's characters and situations as a springboard, he cleverly paints a picture of inter-generational family dysfunction between fathers and sons.

The Offering features three related stories: Abraham preparing to sacrifice Isaac; Jacob tricking Isaac into giving him Esau's inheritance; and Jacob reuniting with his presumed-dead son Joseph.

By transplanting the patriarchs into a modern setting and tossing in a measure of surrealism, Piatigorsky has created an original, entertaining and enlightening evening of theatre.

At 28, Piatigorsky has already won four Dora Mavor Moore awards in 1998-99 for his play Easy Lenny Lazmon.

Offering director Chris Abraham has collaborated with Piatigorsky several times before, including on Easy Lenny Lazmon.

In The Offering, three totally different acting styles emerge. Playing the young Isaac, Jacob and Joseph, Mark Ellis is relaxed and natural on stage.

On opening night, Gary Reineke as the elder Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, presents a more hesitant, slightly less polished performance.

Dean Gilmour as Ram, Esau and Mr. Farrow, infuses the entire proceedings with a gleeful intensity that spelled pure delight for the audience.

The sparse set creates the appropriate atmosphere and the sound effects work well.

But it was perplexing when God didn't even make a cameo appearance, in a play touted as biblically based – at the very least to justify Abraham's predicament.

But Piatigorsky says the answers lie in the world of psychology, not spirituality – that the play was written in a secular context, with secular intent.

It's a cheeky theatrical offering, and the audience loved it!

The world premiere of The Offering, is presented by Moriah Productions, in association with Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

The play runs from March 25 to April 9, at the Artword Theatre, 75 Portland St. Box Office 416-408-2783. Tickets are $18 to $23, Sunday matinees pay what you can.

Three new Hagaddahs offer a unique approach to the Passover holidays

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A lingering childhood memory of Pesach is the Maxwell House Haggadah that we (and everyone else we knew) used for the seders.

They were printed on thin paper, even the cover. By the time I was alert enough to notice, many of the pages were torn, or had wine stains all over them.

The wine stains, in fact, were considered a sign of piety: the more stains, the more joyful was your celebration of the miracle of the Exodus from Egypt.

In reality, the Haggadah has always been treated with a good deal of affection. It has been decorated with many motifs, among them, scenes from nature, folklore and local history.

Some Haggadot have become collectors' items, such as the Sarajevo Haggadah.

Recent years have seen a plethora of new editions of the Haggadah. Three new ones have recently appeared, each with a unique approach to the holiday celebration.

The most traditional one is Why On This Night? A Passover Haggadah for Family Celebration, by Rahel Musleah, with illustrations by Louise August (Simon & Schuster, 2000). It is designed for children to use as an accompaniment to the regular Haggadah.

Musleah not only gives excellent explanations of what is happening, but she writes in an almost lyrical style, that emphasizes the beauty of the Passover experience.

She includes suggestions for family discussions, such as how to make a better world, what being a slave must feel like, or what gifts God has given you. There are plays, poems, songs, recipes, and innovative ways to look at what is happening.

For instance, after lighting the Pesach candles, Musleah says "Close your eyes and think of a wish for the holiday. Now open them. The flames shimmer yellow, orange, and blue with the warmth and beauty of Passover."

The Haggadah is beautifully illustrated in rich reds, jades, greens, blues and blacks.

Those who came of age with The Jewish Catalog's '60s counter-culture approach to Jewish practice, will enjoy A Night of Questions – a Passover Haggadah, edited by Rabbis Joy Levitt and Michael Strassfeld, with illustrations by Jeffrey Schrier (The Reconstructionist Press, 2000).

The extensive historical, theological and introspective commentaries add immeasurably to the understanding of the seder. This Haggadah focuses a good deal of attention on Miriam, the sister of Moses, whose contribution to the Pesach story is often glossed over.

In accord with Reconstructionist philosophy, participants have the option of beginning blessings with the traditional address to God, or the more inclusive ruach haolam, the spirit of the world.

Like the Musleah Haggadah, the illustrations are rich in colour and detail.

On a more sombre note is A Survivors' Haggadah, written, designed and illustrated by Yosef Dov Sheinson, with woodcuts by Miklos Adler, and edited by Saul Touster (Jewish Publications Society, 2000).

This Haggadah was originally written in Hebrew and Yiddish for the first Passover after the liberation from the concentration camps. It was published by Achida and Nocham, two Zionist groups, and reprinted by the United States Army of Occupation.

This Haggadah was used at seders celebrated by Holocaust survivors in Munich in 1946.

The traditional liturgy is supplemented with accounts in prose and poetry of the survivors' experiences during the Holocaust, and the yearning for a homeland that they clung to during the years of hell.

Even the woodcuts reflect the wartime experiences. The one that corresponds to Avadim hayinu l'Paroh b'Mitzrayim (We were slaves to Pharaoh in Egypt) depicts slave labourers digging trenches.

This is not a pleasant Haggadah, but the depth of feeling it evokes is an important reminder of very different Passover seasons.

In the Spotlight: The legendary comedy duo Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster of Toronto started their partnership on radio in 1941 and kept audiences laughing for more than 50 years. A favourite on TV's Ed Sullivan Show, Wayne and Shuster created classic skits and sketches that were often spoofs on themes from history and literature. Titles included The Burning of Rome, The Siege of Troy, The Picture of Dorian Gray and a contemporary version of MacBeth.

This week the duo's surviving member, Frank Shuster, hosts Wayne & Shuster: The First 100 Years, a comedy hour which includes archival footage of many of their most famous acts. The hour includes their comic takes on the film Bridge On The River Kwai (their title: Kwai Me A River) and the film My Fair Lady (their title: My Fair Partner) which recalls how the two became partners.

Tune in to CBC-TV, Sunday April 9, 8 p.m.

Bible TV-episodes now on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Seventeen years in preparation and five years in production, the Turner cable network in the United States has broadcast the first six episodes of its Bible Collection. These episodes have now been released by Warner Home Video and are priced at under $20 an episode.

The series began with Abraham; Richard Harris and Barbara Hershey played the lead roles. Jacob features Matthew Modine, Lara Flynn Boyle, Irene Papas and Giancarlo Giannini. Ben Kingsley, Paul Mercurio, Martin Landau and Lesley Ann Warren star in Joseph. Kingsley also plays the lead in Moses.

Samson and Delilah features Dennis Hopper, Eric Thal and Elizabeth Hurley, while Leonard Nimoy, Jonathan Pryce and Sheryl Lee star in David.

Although the films vary in quality, Abraham and Joseph have won Emmy awards, and others, such as Moses, have received numerous award nominations. Each episode is a complete film on its own, but when watched in sequence, the films tell a marvellous and continuous story.

Viewers can purchase any of the episodes they are interested in, or they can buy the whole series.

Also available for sale is a special, direct-to-video production of Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat.

Filmed in England, this spectacular production features Donny Osmond in the title role and includes Joan Collins and Sir Richard Attenborough in the cast.

This production of Joseph, available on video cassette and DVD, is released through Universal Pictures Home Video and should be in all the major video stores by the time you read this.

Gibraltar is home to a thriving Jewish community

By MYRIAM SCHECHTER
Special to The CJN

GIBRALTAR — I am standing on a rock with a monkey on my head and I am looking across a vast expanse of water towards the continent of Africa.

The rock I am standing on is the Rock of Gibraltar, the southernmost outpost of Europe; the monkey holding on tight to my hair is Baby Elizabeth, a cute Barbary ape, one of the main tourist attractions in Gibraltar; the expanse of water is the meeting point of the Mediterranean Sea and the Atlantic Ocean at the Strait of Gibraltar.

Although physically a peninsula linked by a narrow isthmus to the southern end of the Iberian Peninsula, Gibraltar has been a historical and political island until quite recently – attracting a wide variety of welcomed and unwelcomed visitors all along its turbulent history.

Phoenicians and Carthaginians visited it, followed by Romans – who coined the phrase, Ne plus ultra, go beyond at your peril – marking Gibraltar as the limit of the known world.

Next came the Vandals, then the Goths. In 711, Tariq Ibn Zayid, a Berber from North Africa, landed here using the Rock as a starting point for the 800 year Moorish presence on the Iberian Peninsula; in the process, he also immortalized himself in the name of the place, Gibraltar being a derivative of Jebel Tariq, Tariq's mountain in Arabic.

In 1474, Isabella of Castille reclaimed Gibraltar for Spain, which held on to it until 1704 when it was yielded to the Crown of Great Britain "forever."

This event proved to be of major importance to the Jews who, in 1492, had been expelled from Spain, their home for 15 centuries. Queen Anne declared Gibraltar a free port, and thus attracted immigrants from Spain, Italy, Malta and Portugal, as well as a gradually increasing flow of Jews from Morocco, London, Leghorn (Livorno), Amsterdam, and Marranos from Portugal.

Around the middle of the 19th century, the Jewish community represented more than half the population of the Rock. Among some famous Jews of Gibraltar were Aaron Cardozo, a close friend of Lord Nelson; Judah Benoliel, who was consul to both Austria and the Sultan of Morocco; and more recently, Sir Joshua Hassan who served as the city's mayor and then as its first chief minister.

Our first encounter with the Jewish community of Gibraltar happened in the most charming way. We had arrived there on a day trip, part of a journey through Spain – the most common way to visit Gibraltar – and, after exploring the many tourist sites, were wandering through town looking for a special synagogue we had read about, Shaar Hashamaim, one of the oldest synagogues in Europe.

Communication with the inhabitants was easy, Gibraltar having two official languages, Spanish and English (also two official currencies, the British pound and the Spanish peseta). To our great surprise – and pleasure – we discovered another local language when we met Shimon, a little boy wearing a kippah.

Neatly dressed in navy pants and a checkered sweater, Shimon answered expertly and politely to our inquiries in fluent Hebrew directing us towards the synagogue we were looking for.

One of four active synagogues (a fifth one opens for the High Holy Days), Shaar Hashamaim is indeed a gem located within a courtyard adorned with lively ceramic tiles. We were accompanied on our visit by Shimon Russo, a Gibraltarian Jew whose family had lived there for almost 300 years and who told us about Jewish life in this remote corner of Europe.

But first we had to feast our eyes on the exquisite sanctuary of Shaar Hashamaim: surrounded on three sides by the women's balcony, the light flowing through the large windows brought out the richness of the carved wood of the central bimah and the benches on its sides, while reflecting on the elaborately ornamented silver lamps hanging from the high ceiling.

In the serene quiet of hundreds of years of tradition and faith, we listened to Shimon Russo telling us about his life and his community. Mostly Sephardi, the Gibraltar Jews have absorbed a smaller population of Ashkenazim with whom they share the four orthodox synagogues, a Hebrew school which doubles as a synagogue with services conducted by the school children, a kosher restaurant and two cemeteries.

The Jewish community of Gibraltar – currently numbering about 600 people – has managed, over its almost three centuries of existence, to combine a deep sense of Gibraltarian identity with a heartfelt adherence to Jewish traditional values.

With a population of 31,000 people (driving 25, 000 cars…), with an abundance of tourist attractions and wildlife – including my friends, the famous Barbary apes – with a main street blanketed with duty-free shopping bargains, with a unique combination of location, climate and history, Gibraltar remains one of the most accessible and desirable tourist destinations.

Additional information on Gibraltar:

Gibraltar can be reached by air from England; by ferry from Morocco; and by car from Spain, a short drive from Costa del Sol locations.

Business Profile

Danier Leather set to take on the online world

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Leather is riding the crest of a fashion wave, and no one is happier with this development than Jeffrey Wortsman.

"We believe consumer demand for leather goods is growing, and our expertise in quality leather and suede production fits right in with this picture," said Wortsman, president and chief executive officer of Danier Leather Inc.

Danier, with 73 stores across Canada, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, is Canada's largest manufacturer and retailer of fashionable leather and suede products, from bomber jackets and slit leather skirts to accessories such as handbags and luggage.

"Leather, since the 1980s, has not been in and out of fashion," explained Wortsman, a lawyer by training. "It is a staple of designers' portfolios."

He is not merely boasting.

Nineteen ninety-nine was another record year for Danier, whose most loyal customers range in age from 25 to 40.

"We broke the $100 million revenue mark and finished the year at $109 million. Net earnings rose 38 percent. We opened 15 new stores, including our first in the United States."

And in 1999, he added, Danier moved to a new 140,000 square foot facility in western Toronto. There its head office, distribution centre, manufacturing plant and factory outlet are located.

Danier, which has cornered upwards of one-third of the Canadian leather/suede market, also introduced an e-commerce operation in 1999.

"Visitors from around the world can 'drop by' our Web site, use web cameras to zoom in on various items of interest and purchase them directly online."

The "clicks and mortar" shop, Wortsman believes, has instantly transformed Danier into a global retailer.

At present, less than one percent of its sales are outside Canada. But Wortsman expects the balance to shift radically now that Danier has gone online.

Looking ahead, Wortsman, 42, plans to open 25 to 40 stores in Canada within the next five years, as well as another store down south. Some of these stores will be so-called power centres, with an average of 6,600 square feet compared to about 1,600 square feet for shopping mall stores.

And he is interested in expanding into northern Europe. "The cooler weather," he said, "helps a lot."

Wortsman attributes Danier's success to several factors. "We've got the design, the quality and the price."

Danier, with a total of some 1,000 employees, has 14 in-house designers and pattern makers attuned to the latest styles.

They attend trade shows and are in touch with forecasting services which track the newest colours and fabrics coming out of mills.

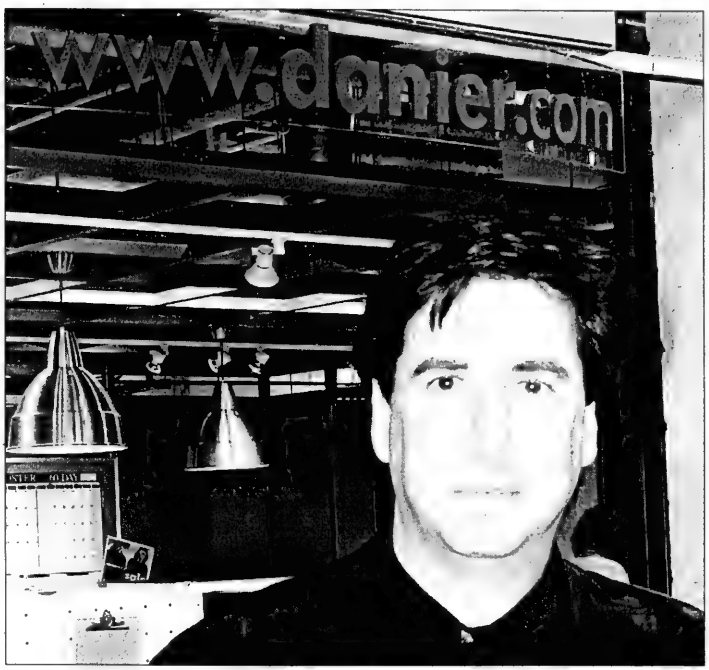
"There's always a fashion focus to what we're doing," said Wortsman.

Danier buys the finest hides in Europe and Asia and works with tanneries in Italy, Spain, New Zealand, China and South Korea. (There is apparently only one tannery left in Canada, in Quebec).

Its state-of-the-art factory in Toronto churns out about one-third of all its goods, with the emphasis on sportswear.

And Danier's sub-contractors abroad are monitored by its own quality-control personnel.

Danier prices are reasonable because of its vertically integrated corporate structure.



Jeffrey Wortsman

"Since we have total control of the product, from raw materials to final retail sales, we're able to eliminate any middleman increments, which means that the ultimate cost of the product is as low as it can possibly be."

Typically, Wortsman claimed, Danier retail prices are 30 percent less than its direct competitors, making the product commercially appealing, while maximizing company revenues.

Wortsman's father, Irving, whose parents immigrated to Canada from Poland in the early 1900s, developed this concept.

Now 73, Irving began as a small wholesaler in 1972 when he founded Royal Leather Goods Ltd. in downtown Toronto.

Two years later, he opened his first store, calling it Leather Attic.

"I never intended to join the business," said Wortsman, who studied law and business administration at York University, and was called to the bar in 1985.

Indeed, for a year after that he worked for a Bay Street discount brokerage firm.

But when his father summoned him, he joined the family business. "I fell into it," he said.

In 1986, the year Wortsman arrived on the scene, Leather Attic became known as Danier.

"My father came up with that name. It works across Canada, in English and French." (Danier has seven stores in Quebec.)

In 1998, Danier went public in a bid to spurt growth. The strategy worked.

"We've doubled in size in the last three years," said Wortsman, who owns 17 percent of the stock.

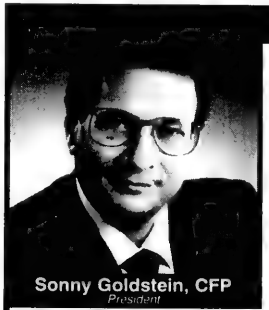
Although Irving is retired, he sits on the board of directors and comes into the office every day.

Apart from his father, Wortsman, who has two sisters, is the only member of the family at Danier.

The father of three toddlers, he is married to Leigh Levin. Consumed by his duties, he works 10 to 12 hours a day, and usually travels one month out of every year.

Wortsman, who has a closet-full of Danier brand leather coats and jackets, enjoys his job immensely.

"It's challenging working here. You need to be a generalist. It's not a big business, but it's quite complicated."



Sonny Goldstein, CFP
President

The many faces of Russian President Vladimir Putin

By LEV GORODETSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Just days before the Russian presidential election, the country's state-controlled television channel ran an ad claiming one of the presidential contenders was controlled by Jews, foreigners and gays.

The attack ad on the ORT channel against Grigory Yavlinsky, who has Jewish roots, came as something of a surprise because Russian President Vladimir Putin had not played a strong nationalist card during the campaign. Putin won last month's election with 52 percent of the vote

If anything, it was the campaign of Putin's main rival, Communist leader Gennady Zyuganov, that had been tainted from the start with Russian nationalism, and open anti-Semitism at times.

A typical ad for the election – which came amid ongoing concerns about anti-Semitic incidents and the economic downturn, ran: "What is the secret of Zyuganov? He is kind and honest – a genuine Russian," implying that people like Yavlinsky are not.

But looked at in another light, the sudden appearance of the anti-Semitic campaign ad – which Putin's team has denied any prior knowledge of – is not surprising at all.

There have been at least two Putins so far: the man who, after being designated heir apparent by former Russian president Boris Yeltsin, promised President Bill Clinton and British Prime Minister Tony Blair that he would pursue free market reforms and human rights, and the former KGB officer who has pursued the war in Chechnya with a vengeance.

Putin has not permitted journalists the freedom to cover either that bloody war against Muslim separatists or the campaign itself.

"I've been joking that it's not clear which Putin is going to win the election," said Carol Saivetz, a research associate at the Davis Centre of Russian Studies at Harvard University. "He's been purposefully vague about what his plans are for the future."

This vagueness allowed Jewish voters, like their fellow Russians, to project onto Putin whatever they themselves want.

All share a desire to see stability, a leader who will restore order and authority of the state and crack down on the "thieves and oligarchs," even at the expense of some democracy.

Exactly how this will translate in the coming months is unknown. Will Putin pursue free market reforms and crack down on anti-Semitism or will he become an authoritarian leader who allows free market reforms, but limits individual freedoms and pays scant attention to human rights?

Will he, as he did in the parliament, form an alliance with Communists and their leader Zyuganov, who received roughly 30 percent of the vote – slightly less than he did in 1996?

Or will Putin rely on the reformers who backed him in the election, such as former prime minister Sergei Kiriyenko?

Putin gave a positive indication for Jews last week, when he sent word to an annual Jewish choral competition in Moscow that he would nominate the director of Moscow's Jewish Art Centre, to become a hero of the state. Leopold Kaimovsky, who was stabbed in a Moscow synagogue in July, was given a standing ovation.

But all of the answers to these questions are still unknown, and will be answered only in the coming weeks. Putin is not expected to announce the makeup of his government until May, when he is also expected to receive an economic report from a think tank that he helped establish.

The pre-election anti-Semitic ad that captured international headlines demonstrates that there may be two Putins regarding Jewish issues as well.

Since Yeltsin plucked Putin from obscurity and made him his prime minister in August 1999 – and then acting president when he resigned on Dec. 31 – Putin has often stated his willingness to combat anti-Semitism and xenophobia.

In November he met with the leaders of the umbrella Federation of Jewish Communities of Russia. More recently he pledged to combat the scourge of anti-Semitism in a response to a letter of concern from U.S. legislators.

Even though it was clear from polls that Yavlinsky, who garnered less than six percent of the votes, had no chance of winning the election, Putin's ad was vicious.

Yavlinsky was accused of having spent 10 times as much money on his election campaign as was legally permitted. It was further alleged that he had illegally received this extra money from abroad and from the Jewish media tycoon Vladimir Goussinsky, who heads the umbrella Russian Jewish Congress.

The ad, which mentioned that Goussinsky is an Israeli citizen, clearly meant to stress Yavlinsky's Jewish and Israeli connections, by showing footage of him sitting among kippah-wearing Jews.

It is believed that Yavlinsky, in fact, captured the bulk of the Jewish vote in Moscow and St. Petersburg, and it is estimated that Jews voted for Putin in more or less the same percentage as the general population in provincial cities.

USDS Bayview wins day school hockey tournament

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Youngsters from five Jewish day schools traded in their pencils, papers and books for skates, sticks and pucks as they recently took to the ice in the third annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Hockey Tournament.

Teams from USDS Bayview, USDS Richmond Hill, Bialik, Leo Baeck and the defending champions, Associated's Kamen Kings, participated in the day-long event, held at Chesswood Arena.

The play on the ice was fast and furious as young skaters got the opportunity to strut their stuff before friends and family. USDS Bayview beat Bialik 6-3 in the final to emerge as tournament champions.

The hunt for hockey talent began early in the season with the schools holding training camps.

"There were tryouts in December. The tryouts consisted of skating drills. We had to find out who could skate and shoot the puck," said Debbie Noyek, who not only had two kids playing for USDS Bayview but who played a major role in organizing the event.

Approximately two months before the tournament, the teams began tuning up with early morning scrimmages.

"The teams would meet at 7 a.m. for practice. We had two games going on with one team sitting out," Noyek said.

Clearly, the participants were serious about winning it all.

The tournament was launched to give the students an extra curricular activity that centred on sports and to bring together children from different Jewish day schools.

"The day is about a bunch of kids having fun and playing hockey. It's about playing together as a team and representing your schools. At the end of the tournament, every participant gets a tournament skate towel. They also get a professional team picture taken," Noyek said.

Noyek's family was heavily involved in the tournament. Her husband, Steven, coached USDS Bayview while their sons, Adam and Corey, were defence partners on the ice.

For USDS forward Kevin Willer, skating against his buddies was a highlight. "I liked playing against Bialik because I know a lot of people on the team," said Willer, a Grade 6 student who also plays triple A hockey for the Don Mills Flyers.

The other members of USDS Bayview's championship team are: Jared Topper, Jacob Fink, Brett Gladstone, Stacy Grossman, Brahm Klar, Kyle Szames, Zach Himmel, Daniel Klerer, Zachary Potashner, Jared Ostroff, Jonathan Frankel, Josh Zimmerman and Jamie Collins. Shawn Klerer served as co-coach.

Mah Jongg: popular and a craze

By MARLANE SMITH
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — When contacted to discuss her interest in mah-jong, Marie Doduck's response was, "Can you call back later? I'm in the middle of a game right now."

Like thousands of other North American Jewish women, Doduck plays the Chinese tile game regularly.

In Vancouver alone, hundreds of Jewish women meet at least once a week to play.

"I know of approximately 20 groups in Vancouver," said Roberta Kremer, the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre's executive director.

That's 20 groups of four to eight women, she explained. "It's the game most played by Jewish women."

Doduck, a Holocaust survivor who immigrated to Canada in 1948, plays twice a week with the same group she has known for 20 years.

"It is fun. It's camaraderie. The women become part of a family. We know about each other's children. We're more than friends," she said.

In fact, a younger generation of mah-jong players is getting involved in the game, including Doduck's daughter.

"It's becoming a craze on some college campuses," Kremer said.

The game was so prevalent in Kremer's home as a young girl in Wisconsin that she believed mah-jong was a Jewish game. "I thought the markings on the tiles were Hebrew," she said with a laugh.

According to Graham Johnson, an anthropology professor at the University of British Columbia, Jewish women are among the fiercest adherents of mah-jong in North America. In fact, the latest Jewish-related top-10 list circulating on the Internet states that if computers were Jewish, mah-jong would replace solitaire as the top computer game.

A friend taught Doduck to play 20 years ago, but Jewish women's involvement with the game in America dates back to the 1920s, and even earlier in China, when thousands of Jews fled eastward from Russia, settling in Harbin and other Chinese cities.

The exact origin of the game itself is subject to many theories. One postulates that Noah and his family kept dry during the 40 days of rain by playing mah-jong under the decks of the ark.

Another speculation hypothesizes that the game began 2,500 years ago in the Chinese royal court during the time of Confucius. The great Chinese philosopher was rumoured to have had a fondness for birds, which may explain one translation of the name mah-jong into hemp-bird.

Johnson doubts this theory and said mah-jong literally translates into horse-bird or horse-sparrow.

The most logical theory suggests that the game has been developed over time from various other Chinese games.

During the Sung Dynasty, 960 to 1279 CE, a game was played with tiles made of wood or ivory in a shape similar to that of present day mah-jong tiles.

A card game with similar suits to those in mah-jong was played during the Ming Dynasty, 1368-1644.

Two brothers from Ningpo may have created the current game around 1850, a theory Johnson thinks may have validity. "My sense is the modern form developed during the 18th to early 19th century."

The western world's first exposure to the game is believed to have been in English clubs in Shanghai in the early 1900s. An English businessman, Joseph P. Babcock, spotted it and imported game sets to Britain.

In 1920, a lumber merchant from San Francisco, began importing mah-jong sets to the United States.

"It was the 1920s drawing room game," Johnson said. Mah-jong became a great national leisure activity and served as a diversion during the Depression's hard times. Jewish women, especially in New York, ardently took to the game.

Did they have more leisure time than other women? Not necessarily, Johnson said. What drew them in was probably what attracts most adherents: the challenge.

"It is not an easy game to play," he explained. "You've got to keep your wits about you. It's a randomized success, involving skill and probabilities."

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

National Post writer Ezra Levant is entitled to the editorial latitude accorded columnists (this one included), but his screed last week against Canadian Jewish Congress was a thinly disguised exercise in mean-spirited (not to mention erroneous) polemic.

The upshot of Levant's opinion is that the J no longer belongs in CJC because Congress has taken up "postmodern, post-religious" causes and is thereby threatening to undermine Canada's Christian character by, among other things, banning the Lord's Prayer in public places.

The troubling tone of the piece is one thing; that Levant plays fast and loose with the facts is another.

For one, he states that CJC was founded "to defend and promote the practice of a religion." Wrong. Congress isn't, and never was, a religious organization. It is dedicated to the protection and advancement of human rights for Jews and other minorities.

Levant charges Congress with demanding that the Ontario government "ban" praying in the legislature and town councils. Wrong, big time. In letters to the Speaker of the legislature and the Minister of Municipal Affairs last month, Congress noted that given the Ontario Court of Appeal's ruling last fall that the recitation of the Lord's Prayer at a certain town council meeting was unconstitutional (and by extension, illegal too at other town councils and public bodies), Queen's Park might want to bring its own practices into line with the law.

That bears repeating, for it forms the linchpin of Congress' activity and shows what Levant has conveniently omitted. It was the highest court in the province (not CJC) that said the Lord's Prayer violates religious freedom because it imposes a "Christian moral tone" on public deliberations, and that everyone is entitled to attend public meetings without feeling pressure to conform "to the religious practices of the majority." The court's ruling, by the way, was unanimous.

Levant later identifies Bernie Farber as "CJC's spokesman on prayer banning." A cheap shot, and incorrect. Neither Farber nor CJC have ever called for any prayer, including the Lord's Prayer, to be banned. They have simply asked for the rule of law, which Levant so cherishes, to prevail. And at no time did Farber refer to the Lord's Prayer as "archaic." His remarks, as reported in Levant's own newspaper of last Sept. 2, was that it was archaic to force children to stand and recite a prayer "which is more or less meaningless to them."

"Why is the Christian Canada that was attractive to Jewish immigrants in the 1900s unacceptable in the 2000s?" Levant asks, strongly suggesting that he's never read None is Too Many. And it was not "Christian" Canada that Jewish immigrants found so attractive, but rather democratic, wide-open Canada with its British parliamentary system that they pined for.

And he wonders why the "perfunctory recitation of a generic prayer" is a threat. The recitation of the Lord's Prayer is hardly ever perfunctory, nor is the prayer generic, as the Court of Appeal pointed out. Heads are bowed, hands are clasped and eyes are shut tightly in a religious exercise that engages in a Christian prayer. (A generic one would be fine by CJC and the Christian churches which support it). Should children and taxpayers still be held captive to the religious beliefs of others?

Levant also wonders how CJC can "credibly call for public tax dollars to fund Bible-centred Jewish schools while it lobbies for an end to the Lord's Prayer in other public facilities?" CJC and the rest of the community simply want the same treatment as Catholics. In February, no less a body than the United Nations agreed.

Levant's final, distressingly retro paragraph is most disturbing: "It is time for the CJC to show the same tolerance for Christianity that has been shown for Jewish prayer by our gentile homeland." In other words, sha shtill. Don't anger the goyim. Take what they give us. Behave.

I'm sure glad the Jewish Ezra Levant wasn't around when CJC was fighting for the rights and freedoms he enjoys today.

About Seniors

By DR. MARK CLARFIELD

At a public ceremony recently, the Queen forgot where she had put her glasses. Some of her subjects may have thought that the monarch was showing an early sign of Alzheimer's disease. However, the Queen clearly remembered that she wore glasses, and in that distinction lies the fundamental difference between normal aging and a dementing illness.

When a person is judged by a physician to suffer from dementia (a chronic, insidious loss of cognitive functions including memory, judgement and language), a further distinction must be made.

The fact is that most patients with dementia suffer from Alzheimer's disease or multiple strokes. In neither case can treatment either reverse or limit the ongoing damage to the brain.

However, a few people contract a disease (for example, low thyroid function) for which early treatment can actually achieve an improvement in the cognitive symptoms.

Although very few dementias can be reversed, given the disastrous consequences of leaving even these cases untreated, as soon as the dementia syndrome is diagnosed, a search for reversibility should be initiated.

Fortunately, almost all of the main causes of treatable dementias can be diagnosed after analysis of the patient's medical history, a physical exam and a few simple laboratory tests.

There is also a much smaller group of diseases within the brain: tumours, subdural hematoma (leakage of blood between the skull and brain) and hydrocephalus (water on the brain). These three conditions are usually suspected on the basis of the patient's clinical history and physical exam.

Unlike the more common causes of reversible dementia, these brain diseases require a CT scan for diagnostic confirmation. On the other hand, such an X-ray cannot rule out the commonest non-reversible cause of dementia – Alzheimer's. This scan can be used only to rule out structural disease of the brain.

Clearly, the physician's involvement with such patients does not end once the rare reversible causes are ruled out. At this point, the art of management is required. The patient's doctor, nurse, social worker and the local Alzheimer's Society of Canada can be of great assistance in dealing with those whose brain function will continue to deteriorate despite all therapies.

Queen Elizabeth merely forgot where she had put her glasses, and she can still perform her work effectively. Unfortunately for many others, when dementia is diagnosed, the likelihood of finding a treatable underlying cause is very small indeed.

Mark Clarfield is the chief of academic affairs at the Sarah Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem and a staff geriatrician of the Division of Geriatric Medicine, Sir Mortimer B. Davis – Jewish General Hospital, McGill University, Montreal.

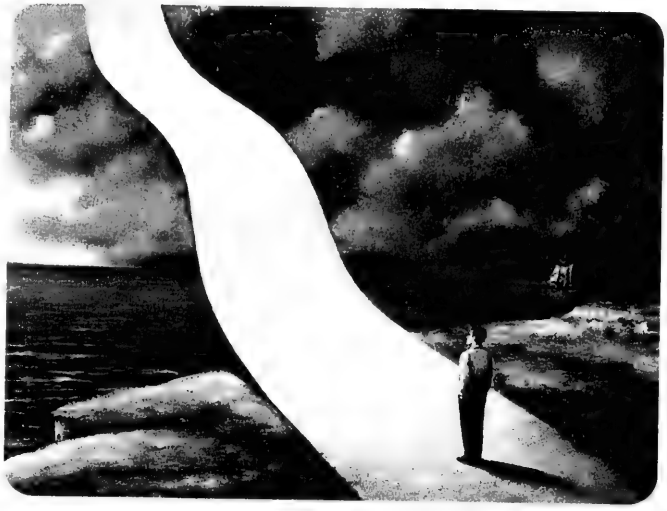
THE CARPOOL LANE TO REDEMPTION

EDITORIAL BY DAVID SUISSA



We live in a vertical world.

We "jump over hurdles" as we aspire to "move up the ladder". We say "onward and upward" as we "upgrade" our technologies. After a stumble, we "rise" to the occasion or "step up" to the plate. This vertical instinct has perhaps been the key to our physical survival.

Lately, though, I've been wondering whether it would benefit our spiritual survival if we spent more time looking in a different direction: sideways.

Looking sideways would mean, for example, showing a genuine interest in each other's customs and traditions; working together despite – in fact because of – our differences; sharing light rather than creating heat; and ultimately, putting love and unity first.

In one of his many talks on the Redemption, the Lubavitcher Rebbe (Parsha Vayigash-1990) explained that "the first step in ending the exile is spreading unity among the Jewish people," and he added that "this will establish unity in the world." If we agree that the stakes are so high, then it's worth asking: How might we speed up the process?

If you've ever been on an LA freeway, you know all about the carpool lane. During rush hour, if you have one or more passengers, you can take the speedier carpool lane. If you're alone in your car and cursing at the traffic in front of you, you can see other cars flying by just because they've got passengers.

The same could be said about unity. If we ride together, we can get there quicker – we can all ride in the carpool lane to Redemption. Conversely, if we just wait for Redemption to unite us, we could spend the next millennium stuck in traffic – frustrated and very alone.

Somehow, we're always finding obstacles to unity, especially noble-sounding ones like "the Truth". Yet as we struggle over beliefs and ideologies, let's not forget two things. One, our disagreements are rarely simply about heroic Truths. The fact that we, as Jews, have so many divisions within our denominations is proof enough. Second, unity – pure, unconditional unity – is itself a noble truth, some would say a Divine truth that transcends all others.

This Spring issue of OLAM is devoted to the child of unity: love. Love for the Creator, for Torah, for nature, for music, for paradox, for prayer, for home, for redemption, for the everyday, and mostly, love for each other.

In the end, there will always be those who argue that unity as an ideology of its own is a cop out. Maybe so. What is undeniable, however, is that life is so much more enjoyable in the carpool lane, when we can look sideways and see that we're not alone.

OLAM's mission: To share the universal light of Torah and Judaism with the entire world.

FINNEMAN'S GREAT DISCOVERY

SOUL FICTION
BY MIKE INDGIN

Finneman was the man. He was, quite possibly the Man of the Millennium. At the very least, he was the man of the hour.

If you read your history e-mail, you know all about Finneman. But no one knew Finneman better than I did, for I was his partner.

So you never knew Finneman had a partner? Ha! Do you suppose he explored every inch of the Universe by himself?

You see, I avoided the limelight due to a slight abnormality in the shape of my skull. Some insensitive colleagues called me Spudhead... look, it's not important to the story. Take my word for it, I was Finneman's partner.

As you know, Finneman was only 17 when he invented the Finnemaphone. By 21, he had used it to locate 437 missing persons, 242 dogs, countless cats and, in a heartwarming tale plastered all over the Internet, Mrs. Berman's escaped red-eyed tree frog (Agalychnis callidryas).

Yes, the Finnemaphone detected vibrations of life. If you read your biology e-mail, you know that every living organism radiates its own unique frequency. Rats, ticks, mites, cockroaches, state senators, you name it. This astounding machine was sensitive enough to differentiate between them all.

No matter how far away – or in the case of Mrs. Berman's tree frog, how small – if it was alive, the Finnemaphone could sense it. Then this glorious apparatus would give you a good approximation of what the living creature looked and sounded like via a hologram. You know, like the message from Princess What's-her-name in that Star Wars movie.

One day in his early thirties, Finneman pointed the Finnemaphone up a tree to locate a rabid Eurasian red squirrel (Sciurus vulgaris). It was then that he discovered that our atmosphere did not confine the machine. A few trips to Washington and a couple of billion dollars later, Operation Find Life Elsewhere In the Universe was underway.

No more shuttles needed to be built; no more probes had to trek across the vast wasteland of space. The Finnemaphone could scour the entire universe for life in just 15 years, a mere blip in the history of time. So we began pointing and clicking, pointing and clicking, pointing and clicking.

It was Finneman's idea to not check the readings until the machine had retrieved all its data. His eyes got wild when he talked about The Big Retrieval Day. "Imagine the suspense," he would say, "the build up and the betting pools. [illegible] planets out there are teeming with [illegible]. A thousand? A hundred thousand? [illegible] how we spent our time [illegible] and the clicking.

"and in an instant the entire globe knew just how many other planets in the universe contain intelligent life..."

Our own planet's governments spent their time arguing over who would be the first to reap the knowledge of other-worldly beings (asking them questions was not a problem, since the Finnemaphone could send data as instantaneously as it could receive it). The battle got heated. Everyone wanted to be a part of the first transmission to our celestial brethren, the first to receive the advanced wisdom that surely would give us answers to our earthly dilemmas. So the lobbying started. We received pineapples from Hawaii, robots from Japan, coffee from Brazil and cash from Las Vegas.

By The Big Retrieval Day, we had settled all the bickering by simultaneously connecting every high government official to our site at www.talktothealiens.com. You know what happened next – after all it's the number one downloaded news clip of all time. With a well-rehearsed theatrical flourish, Finneman flipped the Finnemaphone's output switch and in an instant the entire globe knew just how many other planets in the universe contain intelligent life: Zero.

You could sense the shock of the electronically assembled masses. It appeared that from here to infinity, our spinning blue ball was the only planet that hosted life. We had seen the last hope for humanity and it was us. Terrifying thought.

Panicked, governments around the globe began throwing more gifts and money at Finneman, begging him to retry his experiment. But Finneman knew that one test was all that was needed. The Finnemaphone was as reliable as the man who had invented it. He returned the checks uncashed (though we ate most of the pineapples).

After I had gathered up the last of my textbooks, I crossed the room to shake Finneman's hand. "So that's it," I said. "The quest for higher wisdom is over."

Finneman surprised me by saying, "Not at all, my lumpy-headed friend. Not at all."

I was stumped. We had covered the entire Universe. Where else was there to search?

Finneman gave me a wry smile and I suddenly got it. I smiled back, feeling foolish for not understanding sooner.

With that, my partner donned his hat and turned the doorknob, bracing himself for the storm of reporters waiting outside the door.

What's A Mitzvah Without Love?

BY SIMON JACOBSON

Most of us are familiar with the story in the Talmud of the man who asks the sage Hillel to teach him the entire Torah standing on one foot. Hillel replies with a cardinal law: "Don't do unto others what you don't want done to yourself. This is the entire Torah. The rest is commentary." In essence, Hillel is saying that the entire Torah is love. Love for your fellow.

Sounds simple enough. But upon perusal, Hillel's words are perplexing. Anyone familiar with Torah knows that a large part of the Torah does not seem to be related to love in any overt way. For example, the laws of eating kosher, prayer, Temple offerings, the laws of purity and impurity, have no connection with loving others. Only laws between man and man – love your neighbor, charity, welcoming guests, visiting the sick, the laws of being kind and generous – are expressions of love. So what does Hillel mean when he says that the entire Torah is love?

Rabbi Schneur Zalman explains in his classic work, the Tanya (chapter 32), that the entire Torah aims to establish the supremacy of the soul over the body; spirit over matter; quality over quantity; and thereby manifest G-dliness in the world. Instead of our physical desires and needs being the driving force in our lives, the soul should be the driving force and the body its vehicle.

This is the essence of true love. How can two distinct people love each other selflessly when they each have their own individual needs and interests?

Because love is about transcending the separation inherent in our material lives and accessing the unity of our spiritual souls. Only when we establish the prominence of spirit over matter, when the soul is primary and the body secondary, only then is true love possible.

Why? Because the first law of physicality is that the corporeal, the material, by its very nature must occupy time and space. And so, one physical entity must preclude another from occupying its place. I must get out of my seat to allow you to sit in it. You have less food if you share part of it with another. Spirituality, on the other hand, by its very nature transcends physical time and space, allowing two people to share, to unite, to love unconditionally. By the law of "spiritual nature" I do not become less if I give to you, I actually become more.

This is the meaning of Hillel's words, that loving your fellow is "the entire Torah." Hillel is actually giving us a profound insight into the nature of both love and Torah: True love is not the narcissistic, selfish fulfillment of one's needs. Love is transcendent: the mastery of spirit over matter, of soul over body. And "this is the entire Torah": the love for one another resulting from establishing the supremacy of the uniting spirit over divisive bodies.

The implications of Hillel's words are far-reaching: You cannot really have Torah if you do not have love. Yes, you can technically perform all of Torah and mitzvot, but entirely miss its spirit: the love and warmth it generates. A mitzvah without love is an oxymoron, because a mitzvah is love. When a mitzvah is done in a way that doesn't foster love of others it desecrates G-d. The Ramban explains that we are specifically forbidden to be obnoxious in the name of Torah. The midrash puts it succinctly: "V'oahavto es Hashem Elokecho" in the Shema prayer means Make G-d beloved in the eyes of others by your own behavior.

Every mitzvah – whether between man and man or between man and G-d – must train us to be less selfish and more sensitive. Saying a blessing on food, for example, gives us a pause to acknowledge that a meal is not an act of self-indulgence and we don't eat just for physical sustenance. The meal should be an exercise in self-refinement: We elevate the food and use its energy to be more constructive and productive in our lives. Shabbat sensitizes us to the recognition that after six days of immersion in the material, we need to assert the dominance of our spiritual lives.

Every mitzvah essentially should make us warmer, more caring individuals, by teaching us how to recognize and connect to the G-dly within. Each mitzvah creates spiritual dominance in its respective area of life, allowing the transcendence and love to permeate every aspect of our lives: when we awake, when we sleep, when we eat, when we love, when we work and when we play.

Our main task is to understand that love of Torah and love of G-d is one with love of others. By doing mitzvot with pure love, we will ultimately actualize our greater spiritual selves: our souls, who have never left the world of love.

Everyday

WHAT KIND OF MYSTICS SHALL WE aspire to be? There are mystics who live in remote caves, who chant and whirl, who lose themselves in the abstractions of the infinite. Yet the Rabbis of our tradition did not have hallucinatory visions or spend weeks fasting. They did not leave this world to dwell in another. They were, in the words of rabbinic scholar Max Kadushin, "normal mystics."

A normal mystic is one who sees, or better feels, the shaping and guiding hand of divinity in all things. No event, whether personal, political or natural, is outside the realm of Divine concern. The normal mystic is, in the phrase once used to describe the philosopher Spinoza, God-intoxicated. Drunk with the Divine. An awareness of God seeps into all the activities of human life until this unseen

"GOD-INTOXICATED. DRUNK WITH THE DIVINE."

Presence is taken as the true ground of being, more real than what we glibly dub "reality".

The normal mystic blesses the marvels of the world: a beautiful sight in nature, an earthquake, a rainbow, a scholar, a potentate, a meal. The normal mystic knows that the greatest reality is the one we cannot see. For the normal mystic the world is real, but it is not all of reality.

Many mystics seek in spirit to leave the world. The normal mystic, on the other hand, plunges into the world to uncover its foundation. The normal mystic seeks the presence of God in the eyes of another human being, in the daily activities and cycles of the world. The mystic wields a telescope, the normal mystic a microscope. The normal mystic is the searcher for the wonder near at hand.

From the constant awareness of God comes an unshakable conviction of wholeness and artistry throughout life. Goodness, decency, learning – all these and more color the canvas of our years.

The prototypical artist in the Jewish tradition was Bezalel Ben Uri. He was the individual designated by God in the Bible to fashion the tabernacle. This great artist was not building a statue for the glorification of the human being, as was the practice in other civilizations. Human artistry was and is a tribute to Divine artistry.

Normal mysticism has been a component of Judaism from the first, from the sublime ancient panegyrics of the prophets to the medieval poets, to the groping hesitancy of the moderns. In moments of greater grace, the believing Jew has found this world shot through with the glory of God.

Many readers have noticed that the Biblical book of Esther, as an example, contains no mention of God's name. Yet in the almost miraculous deliverance of the people, God's presence is keenly felt. In the comeuppance of Haman is God's justice, in the salvation of Esther and Mordecai, and ultimately the entire people, God's compassion. The artistry of the book is to insinuate God's providence even when it cannot be directly "seen." God's name may not be found in the book, but God's presence suffuses the story, and that is the lesson the author of this tale would have us read in the world as well.

The English essayist Hazlitt once wrote, "Man is the only animal that both laughs and cries; for he is the only animal struck by the difference between what is, and what might be." The normal mystics see the world as it is, and because they see a God behind the workings of the world, they also imagine the world as it might be.

A viewer of Michelangelo's statue David cannot help but be struck by its setting. The hall leading to the David is lined with "emerging slaves" sculptures that are more or less realized, coming out of the roughly hewn rock. Some are barely visible, others almost completely emerged. Each is in a different state of freedom from the rock that gave birth to it and yet still holds it. At the end of the hall looms the David, perfectly formed, standing as though it were always there, as if it had never been merely a rough block of unshaped stone. The awed visitor then turns back and looks at those first few undefined hunks of rock to wonder how Michelangelo could have envisioned his masterpiece hiding in the uncut stone. The answer lies in the possibility of seeing potential. The genius of moral artistry is to see possibilities of goodness, of beauty, even when all is ugliness and evil; to believe, however impossible it seems, in the latent beauty behind the blank, bleak material in which that beauty is entombed.

There is a legend in the Talmud concerning the education of a great scholar, Resh Lakish, that makes the same point. Resh Lakish, we are told, began life as a bandit. One day he happened upon Rabbi Yochanan, whose discerning eye caught something special in the young man. Rabbi Yochanan insisted that someone with Resh Lakish's vigor and strength should turn towards nobler pursuits. In time, Resh Lakish became a prominent sage because someone was able to see not only what was but the possibilities inherent and unrealized in this unusual man (Baba Metsia 84a).

The Bible is filled with tales of suddenly recognized potential: Abraham, Moses, Ruth. For to see a David in a blank block of stone, to see Resh Lakish in a bandit, these are great acts of constancy and of faith. All reflect the wisdom of the normal mystic.

The greatest example involves the greatest leader – Moses. Why did God choose Moses to be the leader of Israel? One explanation, which credited Moses' powers of alertness and observation, was that he turned aside to look at the burning bush.

The midrash tells another tale: When Moses was tending his father-in-law's flock, a young sheep escaped from him. He pursued it for a long time until he finally caught up with it drinking from a pool of water. Moses waited until it had finished drinking, and said: "I did not know you ran away because you were thirsty. You must be weary." So he lifted the young animal up onto his shoulders, and carried it back to the flock. When God saw how merciful he was with this little sheep, he knew Moses would be kind to Israel. Because, the midrash states, when God wishes to test people's character, He looks to see how they tend sheep (Exodus Rabba 2:2).

"MAN IS THE ONLY ANIMAL THAT BOTH LAUGHS AND CRIES."

Moses became the leader of Israel not for any dramatic, heroic act but because of a small kindness, a bit of everyday heroism. How we treat the weak and needy is the measure of our heroism. For each of us the question is not what dragons have we slain, but how do we tend sheep.

The normal mystic in the Jewish tradition was one whose life was devoted to the "repairing imperative," that things must be improved, a sense livened by the constant perception of the Divine behind all things. That is the mysticism that brightens this world with the sparks of God.

Yael, God & Me

A Personal Story by Nachum Braverman

This past winter our baby, Yael, was diagnosed with cancer, and since then many people have asked me whether this has challenged my faith in God.

I have learned many things these last few months. All of my friendships were tested in the crucible of those terrible days when we first learned of Yael's illness. I began to value simpler qualities in my friends than I had previously. Caring seemed more important to me than brilliance, and far more rare. At a time when I needed it badly, there were few people who took the time to involve themselves in my life and offer their support. At first I judged harshly those who didn't come forward until I considered whether I would have behaved differently myself. When I realized that I would have acted the same way, what I valued about myself began to change.

Those qualities I had previously thought most precious and important – my intelligence, ambition, and creativity – were completely unimportant to me in my crisis, useless to help Yael or even to help me. It was unimportant whether I was cultured or well-read, or whether my friends were interesting and important. It didn't matter whether I knew more or less than others, and whether I or they were more successful. I realized how often I had failed others through preoccupation with my own talent, which was now clearly so much less important than the ability to care.

These simple lessons seem to me so important, so to the heart of life, that I have come to embrace my own pain with a kind of tenderness. I think through it I may have gained what is best about myself.

Could I have learned these things on my own in a less traumatic way? Some people do, and I suppose I might have also, but I didn't. I am not bitter, but rather reassured that God cares because he interrupted my life to ensure I learned lessons I couldn't live without. If I felt I could be "bad" without consequence (and I think that indifference to other people is bad) then I would feel my life and choices were meaningless and that would cause terrible pain. This crisis in my life, from which I have learned so much, reassures me that God cares.

This is a partial answer, satisfactory to explain my own suffering, but what about the suffering of my baby? How can this be right or just? What is God teaching her? I neither know nor believe I ever will.

Each of us has a special contribution to make to the human world. Each of us is born with the package of assets, deficits, problems and blessings needed for that work. Each of us struggles to understand what our task is and how the package with which we have been born suits us to our work.

I don't know what Yael's task is. I don't know what she needs to learn and I don't know what nuance of awareness she may have brought into the world. She will have to answer those questions as she struggles to understand her own life. Her illness is some part of the puzzle I hope she will understand.

You may say that this is faith and not logic, and you may perhaps be right, but it is not blind faith. My faith comes from my sense of the order, meaning and beneficence of God's involvement in my own life. I hope my daughter will feel the same way.

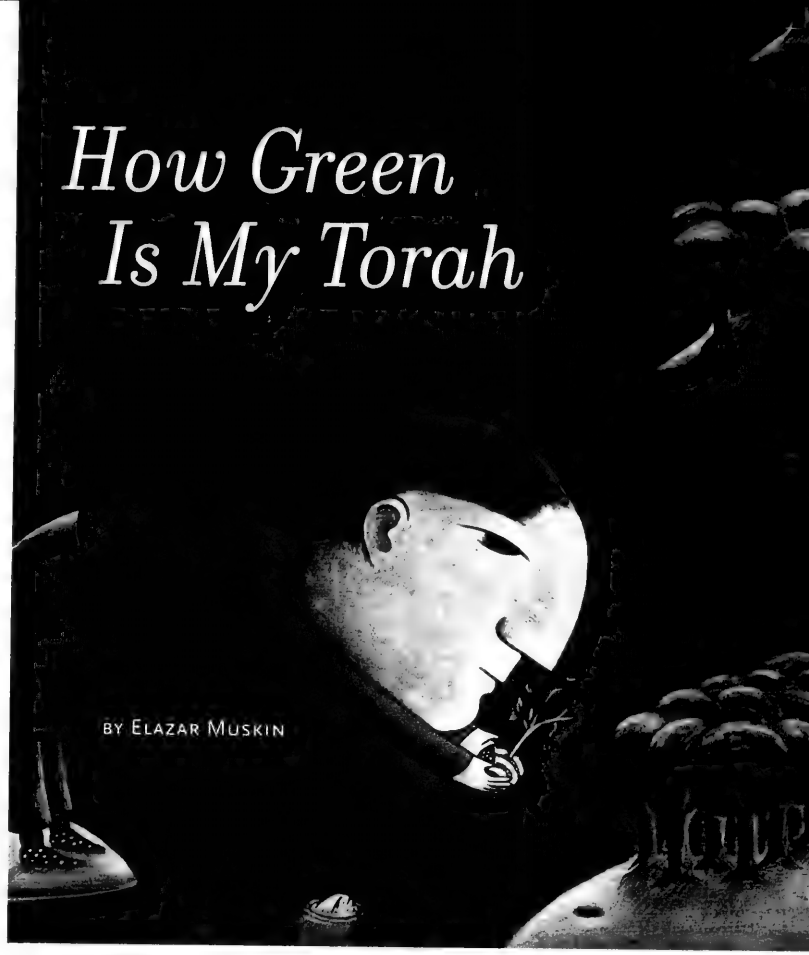
How Green Is My Torah



BY ELAZAR MUSKIN

"TWO HUNDRED YESHIVA STUDENTS PROTEST OIL DRILLING NEAR BEVERLY HILLS."

With that newspaper headline, a battle for a safe environment intensified in a highly populated Jewish neighborhood in Los Angeles.

Hundreds of miles away, disgruntled Westerners shipped 10,000 shovels to Elko, Nevada to protest the US Forest Service's decision to shut down a river road harmful to the environment. The protesters claimed that the Forest Service decision came at the expense of ranchers, loggers, miners and small business owners.

Every day, a passionate battle is fought between those who scream "save planet earth" and those who cry "save our jobs." Religious fervor marks the protests. Religious zeal fuels the slogans. The argument of ecology versus economy is as old as mankind. Yet we can wonder: what does religion have to do with it? For Jews, believe it or not, everything.

Since all Jewish thinking is predicated on the Torah, and the Torah begins with the creation of heaven and earth, it would seem that environmentalism must have a basis in the Torah itself. And so, in fact, it does. Just consider the famous Midrash:

When God created Adam he led him past all the trees in the Garden of Eden and told him, "See how beautiful and excellent are all My works. Beware lest you spoil and ruin My world. For if you spoil it there is nobody to repair after you" (Midrash Rabbah, Kohelet VII.13).

The Torah further commands that our world requires our care. For example, the Torah prescribes soil conservation measures in the commands of Shmitah, leaving the land fallow every seven years (Ex. 23:11; Lev. 25: 2-7), and it even legislates against wanton destruction of trees (Deut. 20:19).

Urban planning likewise is a Torah concern. The Biblical towns of the Levites (Lev. 25:3 and Num. 36: 1-5) were surrounded by two green belts of land, each a thousand cubits wide. One belt was designated farmland and the other an open field. Local governments could not rezone these areas to extend city limits or to promote development. Jewish law, in ruling that this plan applied to all towns in ancient Israel, limited town size, since farmland could not be urbanized nor the open field used for farming.

Urban sprawl, however, wasn't the only concern of Jewish law. The Mishna in Tractate Baba Batra (Chapter 2, Mishna 8 & 9) argues that pollution required solutions. The Mishna states, "It is necessary to remove [from the city limits] the permanent threshing floor, cemeteries, tanneries, and kilns." Since these entities created "damages of smoke and bad odors," harming the health of the residents, they could not be located within city confines.

Dr. Meir Tamari, an internationally renowned Jewish ethicist, in his contemporary work With All Your Possessions, quotes a fascinating sixteenth century ruling from an Italian rabbi, Daniel Estrosa, in his "Magen Giborim", demonstrating the length to which Jewish law protected a community from industrial pollution.

The case dealt with the right to close a slaughterhouse within a city. Rabbi Estrosa responded, "At the outset it would seem that because they have purchased this right from the neighbors, the neighbors have given their consent to its construction and may not be allowed to retract their consent. However, we see that all the authorities argue that, with regard to damages of smoke and bad odors, a man is not really able to bear them, and therefore we may suppose that even if one agreed at the beginning we may not see this as forgoing their rights in the future....Even if, as in our case, they actually sold this right, they may retract their consent, and therefore the slaughterhouses have to be closed."

A century later, a similar issue in Turkey had a different outcome. The townsmen complained to their great rabbi, Chaim Shabsai, author of Responsa Maharchash, about textile dyeing vats located in their city. They argued that the vats were polluting their air, and even though they had originally consented to their operation, now they wanted to revoke that license. The rabbi initially agreed with the people, but then he balanced their protest with concern that this town depended on the textile industry for employment. If the vats were forced to close, noted the Maharchash, it would mean economic doom for the community. He ruled, therefore, that the vats could not be forced to close.

Interestingly, a later rabbi remarked that the Maharchash ruled accordingly only because the case occurred outside Israel, in Jewish exile, where Jews do not control the zoning laws. In their own homeland, he argued, vats would not have been allowed within city limits, avoiding the ecological damage that bothered the citizens.

Whatever the case, it is quite clear that this isn't a new issue for the new millennium. Throughout the ages Judaism has been concerned with ecology.

Whether it be a Jewish neighborhood in Los Angeles or a rural community in Nevada, the environment remains a complex issue that defies simplistic solutions. The Torah, however, provides us with guidelines, and it is our job to follow them. Moreover, as Dr. Tamari observed, "The physical beauty of the world is a valuable enhancement to religious thought and contributes to man's spiritual growth."

Judaism's Womb

"And they shall make for me a sanctuary so that I can dwell amongst them" – Exodus 25.8

A sanctuary. Holiness. They asked Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Kotsk: " Where is the dwelling place of God?" And he answered: "Wherever they let God in." That is precisely the meaning of "And they shall make for me a Mikdash" (a holy sanctuary). If our inner space is imbued with love and is open to God, then I will surely dwell among them.

On Friday night, January 21, one-hundred-and-forty UCLA students transformed our home into a Mikdash – a holy space. They came to pray, to eat, to sing, to socialize, to meet a new friend and to be touched by the magic of Shabbat. They wanted to be part of a community, to feel the press of other young Jews, to identify with the Jewish people, to be transported by the intensity of the spirit and to celebrate their Jewishness in the rabbi's home.

During the course of our work on campus, it has become customary for my wife Doreen and I to host the first Shabbat program each quarter at our home. It has become the place to be, with the number of students participating usually hovering around seventy. This time, however, the numbers exploded. They came from the dorms, from the fraternities and sororities, from the Westwood Bayit, and from their homes in the Valley and the Westside. They included a large contingent of Persians, as well as Russians, Israelis and locals. They were orthodox, conservative, reform, secular, Ashkenazi, and Sephardi. They were Jews seeking to do Jewish things with other Jews in an open, inviting, and comfortable environment that was affirming, inspiring, and warm.

Why the home? Why is it vital that every so often we move our programs out of our institutions and into an intimate space? Because the home is the center of Jewish life. It provides visceral connections to Judaism that become deeply imbedded within our beings. It is the repository of Jewish smells and memories that nurture our souls and our identities. It is the link to the past and future. It is our womb. And the Jewish home is the womb of Judaism.

The students understand that by coming to the rabbi's home they have returned to the source, to the well-spring of their tradition. There, they see a home filled with Jewish books, with Jewish art, and with love. There they see a rabbi and his family as real, down-to-earth people in their natural surroundings. The barrier between the rabbi as a holy and distant authority is shattered as he emerges as an approachable, accessible human being. Judaism itself becomes a natural way of life.

Indeed, the reason that it is so important for the students to come to our home is that I want them to see me hugging and kissing my children and my wife. I want them to remember how Doreen and I placed our hands on Shaul and Shulie's heads and offered them a blessing before Kiddush. I want them to recall the warmth that they felt as they sat crowded in our living room singing l'cha dodi and eating Shabbat dinner.

I want them to learn that although we lost our Temple almost two thousand years ago, we have retained the secret of the Temple – the Jewish home. It is our sanctuary. It is a dwelling place for God's presence, and the secret of our survival.

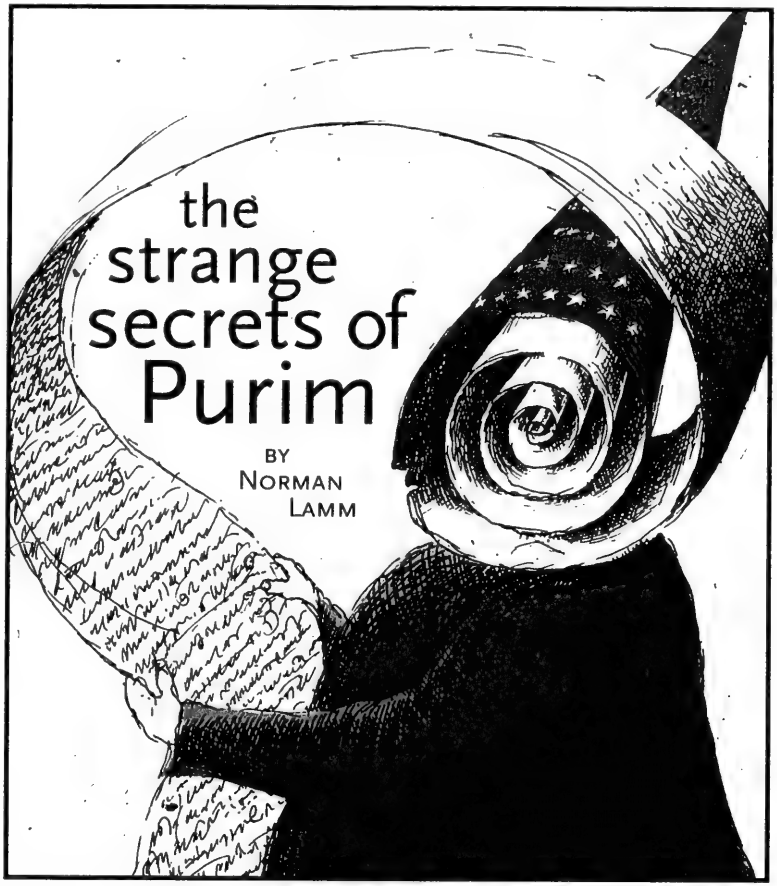
"One must drink on Purim to the extent that one cannot distinguish between 'Blessed be Mordecai' and 'Accursed be Haman.'" So teaches the Talmud (Megillah 7b). It is a familiar text – and a puzzling one, especially when we consider how the Jewish tradition otherwise preaches self-discipline, sobriety, and restraint.

But there is something in this text even more fascinating than this surprising one-day-a-year tolerance for excess. It was the late Rav Kook, Chief Rabbi of the Holy Land, who connected this passage to another one, a connection that opens up new and important vistas. The Talmud (Eruvin 65a) declares, "Wine in, secrets out." (In Yiddish we say, "What the sober one has in his lung, the souse has on his tongue.")



the strange secrets of Purim

BY NORMAN LAMM

This second passage, says Rav Kook, explains the first. Each of us has deep, dark secrets – very deep, very dark. Long before Freud, we knew that evil lurks in the heart of man. At the very beginning of human history, the Torah tells us (Gen. 6:5) that the Almighty proclaimed, "The evil of man is great upon the earth, and every impulse of the thoughts of his heart is but evil continually."

On this one day of Purim, therefore, we are urged to spill out our secrets, to reveal them openly. Such secrets cannot survive exposure; they are photophobic. When you see clearly the nature of your own dark secrets, the very light you shine upon them makes them shrivel up and vanish. The normal sense of shame cannot abide the continuation of the degrading products of the unrestrained lid and the weird imaginations of the unbuckled libido. Force your inner thoughts out, face them openly, and the very embarrassment will rid them for you. The ennoblement of character by the purging of the psyche's deeply embedded secrets is worth the risk of appearing momentarily silly by drinking a bit more alcohol than you are accustomed to on this one day of Purim.

I suggest a modification, or elaboration, of Rav Kook's interpretation of Purim as catharsis. Just as a person possesses (or is possessed by) a yetzer hara, an evil impulse, so does he carry within him the potential for great achievement, the yetzer tov, the good impulse. Indeed, throughout the ethical literature of Judaism there is constant reference to the life-long struggle between these two antagonists. Man's soul is the battleground between the positive and the negative urges, the life-affirming and the life-denying, the noble and the despicable, the mean and the generous.

Our problem then is not only that the yetzer hara is active behind the closed door of our consciousness, but that the yetzer tov is imprisoned within, it is suppressed and therefore de-activated. The evil impulse flourishes in the dark recesses of the soul, but the good impulse craves light and suffers paralysis as long as it remains embedded within. It must be liberated, coaxed out into the open, articulated and implemented, without the fear that a cynical society will look askance at such conduct as self-serving piety.

Our culture – especially that of the self-proclaimed sophisticates who know that we are all essentially grasping, selfish, lusting creatures – sneers at the expression of unadorned goodness. Too often, the effort to act nobly is greeted with a smirk, as if the act of unexpected decency, of anonymous generosity, must have psychological roots: "He's making up for some guilty act," "She's genetically wired to be a goody-goody" – and cannot be "real". Taking on an extra mitzvah, acting and dressing more modestly, devoting more time to the study of Torah, accepting a leadership role in the community are all explained away with a knowing smile by cynics who, as Oscar Wilde once remarked, know the price of everything and the value of nothing.

Hence, it requires a special measure of courage to pull out the secrets of the yetzer tov from within and expose them to the barbs of the cynical critics. If an extra cup of wine can inject us with the strength to risk the sarcasm of the know-it-alls – "wine in, secrets out" – it surely is worth the relaxation of usual standards.

So drink we must, letting it all hang out in the open, letting all that is negative within us shrivel in the light of exposure, and letting all that is constructive, creative, and noble – in a word, divine – within us grow and blossom and bear fruit.

Then we shall surely be able to distinguish between "Blessed be Mordecai" and "Accursed be Haman".

BIRTHRIGHT FOR FRUMMIES

"Fiddler on the [illegible] Original serigraph by A. Hirsch. Published by Safrai Ga[illegible]

I ALMOST LOST IT.

January 2, 2000. I'd like to blame the 3-hour delay at JFK airport on Y2K (there must be a Jewish law somewhere about judging airlines favorably). I was on my way to Israel for a 3-day trip to greet the thousands of college students arriving as part of the "Birthright Israel" program. It was a spur-of-the-moment decision. If I could get a quick ticket and be back home for Shabbat, I'd go. I got it and I was going – with an agenda.

I wanted to meet some of the collegiates and tell them that I was proud of them. Proud that they chose to spend their semester break touring Israel instead of frolicking in Florida. To say to them that this card-carrying frummy (slang for a fundamentalist black-hatted haredi zealot) loves you – just because you're my brother and sister, and respects you despite our differences, and hopes you have a great visit and that you'll come back for more.

I wanted to confront a couple of the program's many critics and say: "Phew on you! These are Jewish kids and they're coming back home. So what if it's only for a couple of weeks. Papa still loves them. He misses them terribly – and would rather have them for a couple of weeks than for no time at all."

I also wanted to shlep some fellow black-hatters along and have them mingle with the participants and the organizers. To say hello to them, to find out what motivated them to get involved, and to find out what can be done to improve our relationship. To tell them that what we share in common is more significant than what divides us.

I know. I'm a dreamer.

As I painfully inched along the seemingly endless check-in line, I became deeply enmeshed in the pandemonium of frustrated passengers. I no longer cared about going to Israel or about my fellow Jews about to embark upon a potentially life-changing experience. The only pleasant thoughts I could muster up were Excedrin and a full refund. I'd settle for 50%, or even a cab-ride back home. Engrossed in planning my escape route, it took a second nudge from the guy behind me to let me know that I was next.

"THE ONLY PLEASANT THOUGHTS I COULD MUSTER UP WERE EXCEDRIN AND A FULL REFUND"

With the possibility of a refund rather bleak, I grudgingly fumbled for my ticket and passport. The pleasant African American gentleman at the check-in counter, however, caught me off guard: "Would that be 'standard' or 'mehadrin' seating?" he gently asked. Not wanting to appear religiously ignorant, or indifferent, I fixed my tie and boldly said, "Mehadrin, of course."

Now, I was familiar with the term "mehadrin" (or, preferred) in connection with food preparation, suggesting a more rigorous standard of Kashrut. Surely this was not what he had in mind. (I had already come to terms with airline food tasting like cardboard, but having a seat cushion for breakfast was going a bit too far.) I then figured that the Rabbis discovered some fibers of questionable origin, possibly a forbidden mixture of wool and linen threads in the seat cushion, and that the airline was good enough to accommodate us by replacing some of them with aluminum seats. How considerate.

Eventually I learned that "mehadrin seating" referred to a section of the airplane designated as a "movie-free zone". Parents who are uncomfortable about exposing their children to a particular movie and the many Orthodox Jews who consider movies, as a whole, detrimental to their own and their children's spiritual well-being, now have the option, on certain airlines, to choose mehadrin, or "preferred" seating.

As I waited in yet another line, longing to rest my aching body on the coveted mehadrin cushion, I pondered the "price" of this novel amenity. The idea of sheltering oneself or one's children is offensive to some, but not to me. Live and let live. But I was afraid that the message, albeit an unintentional one, that this respectful accommodation may send out, will add more fuel to the fire separating Jew from Jew. Many, I fear, will misinterpret this aspiration for spiritual protection as a further rejection of other Jews. "They consider us so impure that now they won't even sit next to us!" Or, "A shtetl in the sky! What will these haredim think of next?"

But for me, there was an even greater concern. By plopping myself down in an all-religious section, I would be depriving myself of what has become a highlight of my previous trips to Israel, my own little "birthright" – interacting for several hours with fellow, though secular, Jews.

Here was an opportunity to learn from one another. To exchange ideas, thoughts, questions, answers, and yes, telephone numbers. To skip all the rhetoric and earnestly hash out what we can do to work together in stopping the plague of ignorance and indifference. But alas, I was flying mehadrin.

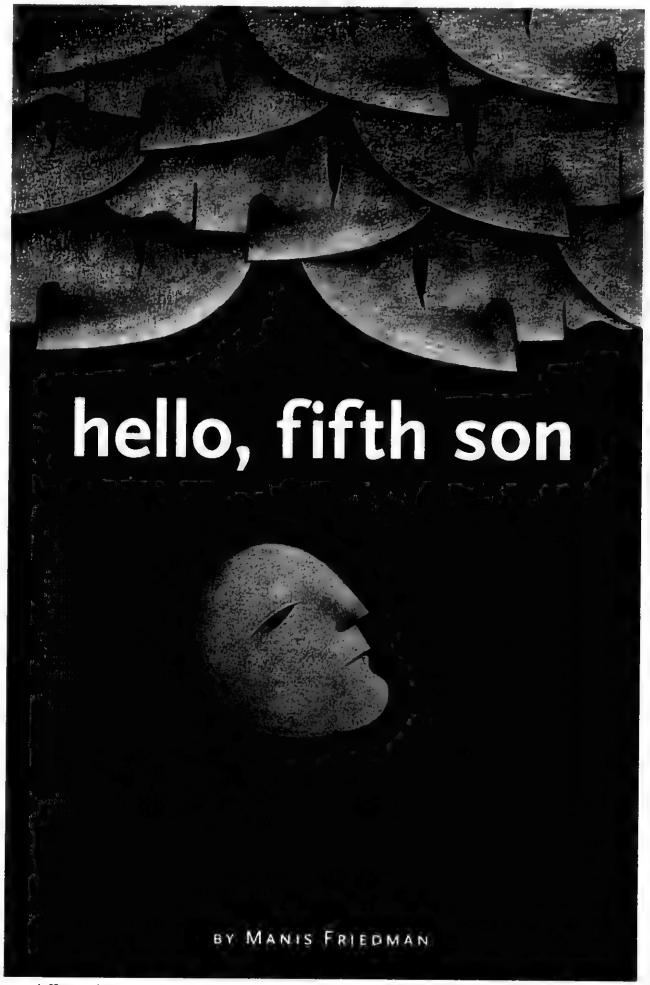
Unenthusiastically, I searched for seat 53a. When I finally reached my destination, there was a little surprise waiting for me: 53b, occupied by a thirty-something fellow with long hair and an earring – completely oblivious to the sanctity of the cushion beneath him. My birthright, restored.

It was going to be an interesting flight after all.

BY ELI GEWIRTZ

Rabbi Eli Gewirtz is National Director of Partners in Torah, a privately-funded organization under the auspices of the National Society for Hebrew Day Schools, committed to Jewish continuity and fostering unity between Jews of all backgrounds.

An idea mentioned in the Talmud years ago concerned the sons at the Seder table, commonly known as the Four Sons. The Lubavitcher Rebbe introduced the idea that there's a fifth son. It was a radical idea at the time.



Who else is there besides the wise son, the wicked son, the simple son and the one who doesn't know how to ask? The Rebbe said, there's a fifth son. The fifth son is the one who refuses to come to the Seder. He didn't just forget, he won't come.

Traditionally, this was the lost member of the family, the one we don't talk about anymore: the one "who stopped being Jewish." The Rebbe said, the fifth son is a Jew and we have to reach out to him and invite him to come to the Seder table.

What part of him refuses to come to the Seder? His Jewish part. His Jewish soul is objecting because the Judaism that is being offered does not live up to his expectations. He wants a better Judaism, not a lesser Judaism. His Jewish soul is asking us to listen.

By hearing what the fifth son has to say, Judaism can be all that it's meant to be. The fifth son is like a safety valve; like a regulator that reacts when something is not working properly. He is a warning bell that tells us when we're drifting, becoming too petty, too insular, or simply just too bland.

For example, the fifth son doesn't come to the Seder because it's just for Jews. He doesn't like that. Why do we have to separate ourselves? Why do we have to make ourselves different? Why do we have to be a small minority when we could be part of the bigger world? He's absolutely right. If G-d wanted us to be insulated, if G-d wanted us to be a little community living someplace in our own little enclave, why would he scatter us all over the world? Why are we everywhere if we don't belong anywhere? The fifth son is right, Judaism is not just for Jews.

Of course, there are parts of Judaism that are just for Jews – "Speak to the children of Israel" and they should do such and such. But in the bigger picture, Torah is not only for Jews, it's the blueprint of creation. And this is the truth that the fifth son knows in his heart.

Particularly, the fifth son gets upset because at the Seder we mention the verse of Jeremiah:16 asking G-d to pour his wrath out on all the rebellious nations. But the fifth son doesn't want to have anything to do with that. He's not like a bunch of frustrated old people who think the whole world is against you and you're going to sit there at your Seder table and vent your frustrations on the world. He doesn't want to do this. He doesn't think this is acceptable. He's right.

He's right because nobody explained that passage to him. If you look at it at face value, it seems like we're venting frustrations. But the greatest compliment you can give a human being is: I hold you to the same standard that I hold myself. Once again, we see a challenge from the fifth son rooted in the Divine.

Another idea the fifth son doesn't like: He cannot accept the suggestion that if he comes to the Seder, then he's Jewish; if he doesn't come, he's not really Jewish. Mitzvahs don't make a Jew, Jews make mitzvahs. The fifth son is right again.

There are other things the fifth son objects to. The fifth son doesn't like division. He wants unity, just as G-d does. The fifth son also doesn't like negativity; he wants joy. For most people, if you're religious, if you're observant, you've got to be serious. You've got to be cautious because around every corner lurks a potential sin. You can't live like this. This is not what G-d intended, and the fifth son knows that. He is looking for a Creator with a vast eternal plan and a Jewish people with a historic purpose. He wants G-dliness with teeth. He wants a G-d he can worship with all his youthful devotion – a G-d who needs him and his service. He wants what the Rebbe wanted and found in the Torah.

The central theme of Judaism is, serve G-d with joy. But then you look around, and where's the joy? The fifth son knows it's in there somewhere. So what gives? The fifth son says, something's wrong with you guys, I'm out of here. Call me when you've got your act together. Call me when you're ready to speak to my Jewish soul. Call me when you're ready to give me a Judaism that doesn't patronize, that doesn't pander, that just is. Call me. You know where I am.

This Passover, let's all try to welcome a fifth son or daughter to our seder tables. It would truly make it a night different than all others.

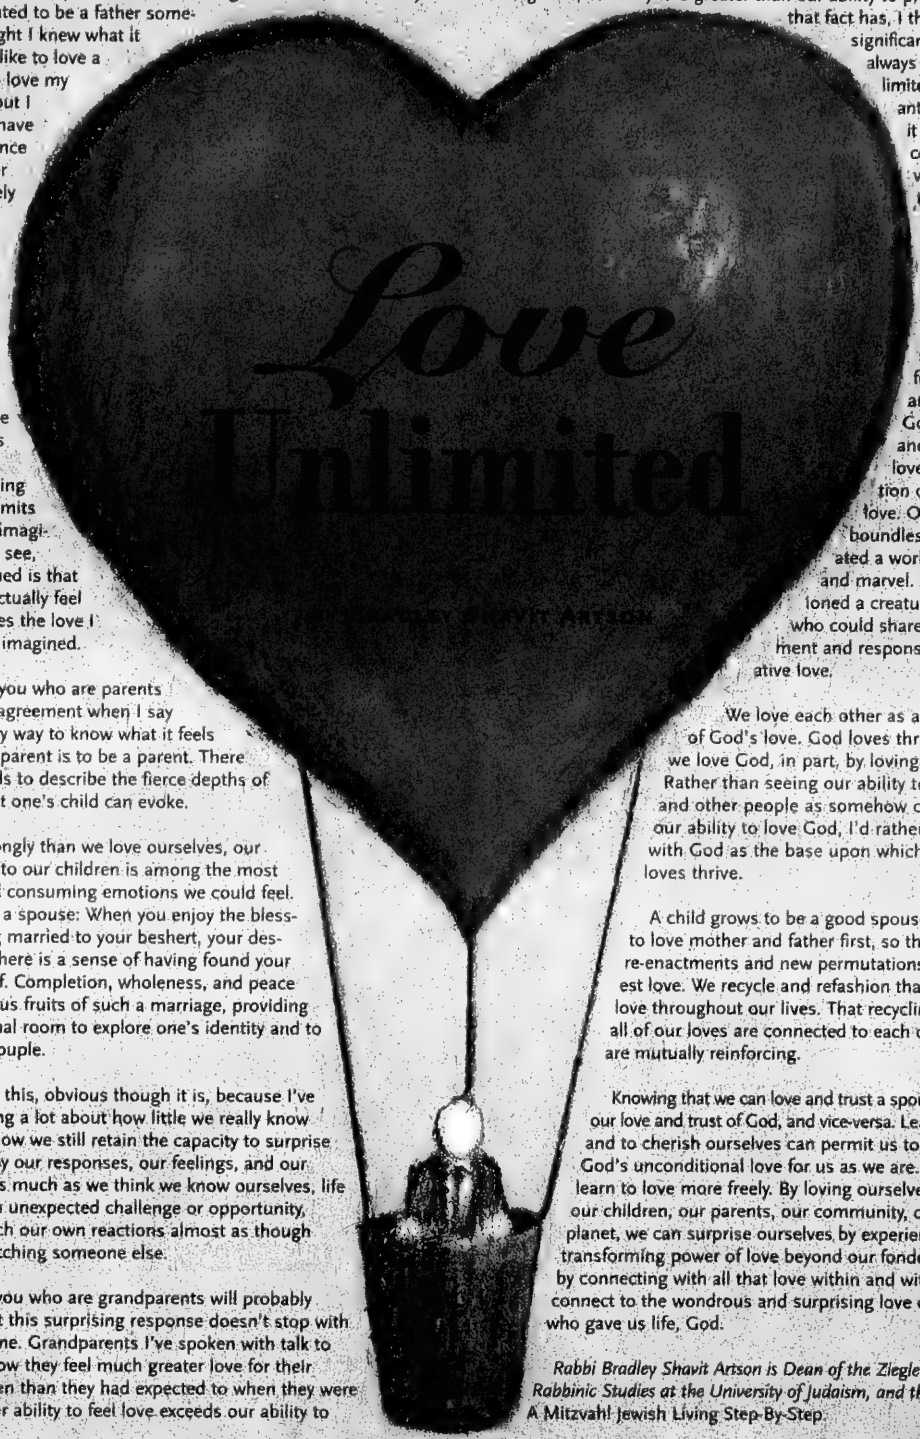
Love Unlimited



As a child, I always knew I wanted to get married, and I always knew I wanted to be a father someday. I thought I knew what it would feel like to love a wife and to love my own kids, but I wanted to have the experience itself, rather than just rely on my intuition.

I have accomplished my desire to marry and to have kids, but the process has also taught me something about the limits of my own imagination. You see, what I learned is that the love I actually feel far surpasses the love I had merely imagined.

Those of you who are parents will nod in agreement when I say that the only way to know what it feels like to be a parent is to be a parent. There are no words to describe the fierce depths of passion that one's child can evoke.

More strongly than we love ourselves, our connection to our children is among the most visceral and consuming emotions we could feel. So too with a spouse: When you enjoy the blessing of being married to your beshert, your destined one, there is a sense of having found your missing half. Completion, wholeness, and peace are the joyous fruits of such a marriage, providing the emotional room to explore one's identity and to grow as a couple.

I mention this, obvious though it is, because I've been thinking a lot about how little we really know ourselves, how we still retain the capacity to surprise ourselves, by our responses, our feelings, and our thoughts. As much as we think we know ourselves, life hands us an unexpected challenge or opportunity, and we watch our own reactions almost as though we were watching someone else.

Those of you who are grandparents will probably confirm that this surprising response doesn't stop with children alone. Grandparents I've spoken with talk to me about how they feel much greater love for their grandchildren than they had expected to when they were younger. Our ability to feel love exceeds our ability to imagine it; certainly it is greater than our ability to predict it. And that fact has, I think, religious significance. Love is always greater than our limited ability to anticipate, because it is part and parcel of something vastly greater than we can comprehend. In our petty presumption, we think we have mastered ourselves and our feelings, but we are made in God's image, and our ability to love is our reflection of God's great love. Out of God's boundless love, He created a world of beauty and marvel. And God fashioned a creature in that world who could share the excitement and responsibility of creative love.

We love each other as an expression of God's love. God loves through us, and we love God, in part, by loving each other. Rather than seeing our ability to love creation and other people as somehow competing with our ability to love God, I'd rather see our love with God as the base upon which our other loves thrive.

A child grows to be a good spouse by learning to love mother and father first, so that all loves are re-enactments and new permutations of that earliest love. We recycle and refashion that same old love throughout our lives. That recycling means that all of our loves are connected to each other, and all are mutually reinforcing.

Knowing that we can love and trust a spouse strengthens our love and trust of God, and vice-versa. Learning to value and to cherish ourselves can permit us to recognize God's unconditional love for us as we are. Let us each learn to love more freely. By loving ourselves, our spouse, our children, our parents, our community, our people, our planet, we can surprise ourselves by experiencing the transforming power of love beyond our fondest hopes. And by connecting with all that love within and without, we can connect to the wondrous and surprising love of the One who gave us life, God.

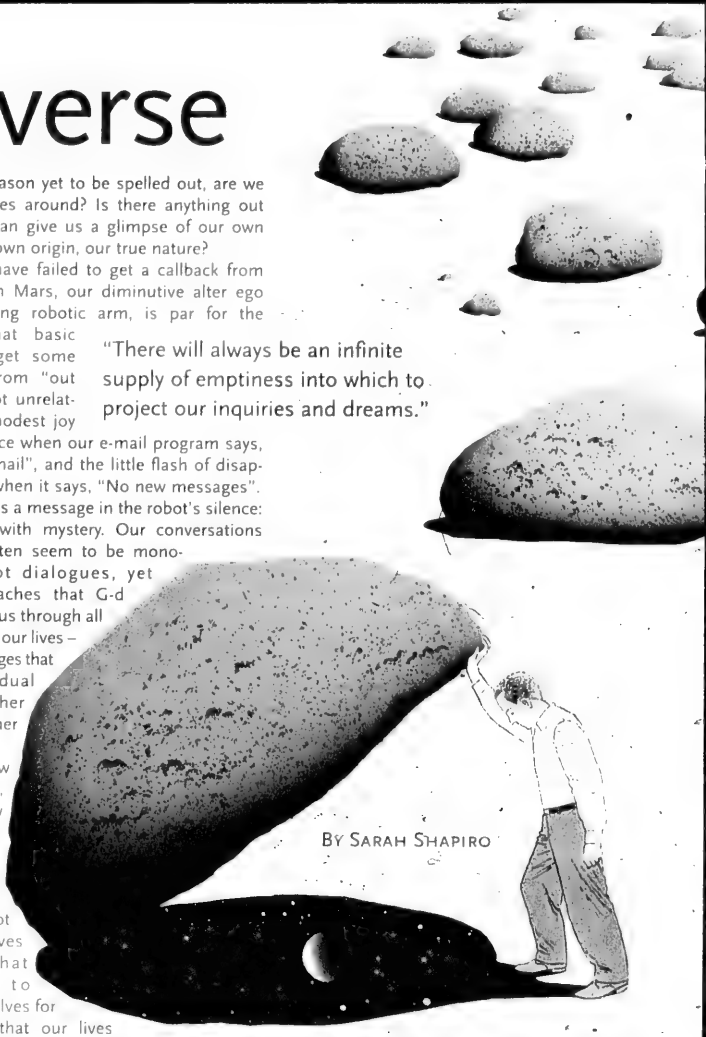
Speak, Universe



By Sarah Shapiro

We couldn't have found a more fitting symbol for the end of the twentieth century than the failure last November of NASA's mission to the Red Planet. Nor could we hope for a more eloquent message to celebrate the birth of this brand new millennium than the meek Mars Lander's continued silence.

"Mars Lander's Apparent Loss Dashes Spirits and Raises Fears," read the headline in the New York Times. "Little hope remains that flight controllers will establish contact." In those two lines can be detected the eternal desire to connect with the unknown; the impossibility of conquering it once and for all, and mankind's never-extinguished hope even amidst failure. "Hope is the thing with feathers," wrote Emily Dickinson, "That perches in the soul and sings the tune without the words and never stops at all."

Here we were once again, thrusting ourselves towards some unseen horizon. Once again we were thwarted by uncontrollable natural forces, evoking an unarticulated sense that somebody or something was rebuking us – not only for our hubris but for our innocence.

We human beings toss our questions out into the universe as if they were prayers, yet our love for answers seems unrequited by a Sphinx-like void that would rather not respond. The hopes and fears of all the years....Are they not met in thee tonight, little robot (already forgotten by us on Earth) that never saw fit to send back any message to us from beyond?

Is there anyone who cannot identify with those who worked on this project? Who among us has not known such failure? "We are all crestfallen," said Wayne F. Zimmerman, lead electronics engineer on the team that developed the 6.5-foot mechanical arm. "Man, it's tough when you put in that much work....It's hard to lose it all."

For Mr. Zimmerman, hope's devastation consisted of a lost opportunity for scientific achievement, but the failures life has to offer come in all shapes and sizes: the promotion not granted, the child talking back, the dirty dishes in the sink. Education errs, Kurt Vonnegut has written, in trying to teach us how to succeed; what it should do is teach us how to fail, because that's usually what happens. Three decades ago, the Times reported, the project's chief planetary geologist, Dr. Bruce Murray, predicted that volumes of water were probably frozen in the Martian polar regions. "This was his first [and last] chance, at the age of sixty-eight, to learn more...."

Our unanswered questions arise from the same all-purpose well that feeds Dr. Murray's curiosity about the water on Mars. A scientist such as he may not call his quest a religious one, but its undercurrents are intrinsically akin to those of any spiritual search: Is life the product of coincidence, and by virtue of the mathematical inevitability inherent in an infinite cosmos, bound to be duplicated elsewhere? Or, for some reason yet to be spelled out, are we the only ones around? Is there anything out there that can give us a glimpse of our own future, our own origin, our true nature?

That we have failed to get a callback from our man on Mars, our diminutive alter ego with his long robotic arm, is par for the course. That basic desire to get some response from "out there" is not unrelated to the modest joy we experience when our e-mail program says, "You have mail", and the little flash of disappointment when it says, "No new messages".

> "There will always be an infinite supply of emptiness into which to project our inquiries and dreams."

But there is a message in the robot's silence: to co-exist with mystery. Our conversations with G-d often seem to be monologues, not dialogues, yet Judaism teaches that G-d speaks with us through all the events in our lives – loving messages that each individual must decipher on his or her own.

On New Year's Eve, as the new millennium began, what most of us wanted was to not find ourselves alone at that moment, to assure ourselves for the record that our lives were successful, that we'd found someone to love and be loved by...a mirror to tell us who we are. We wanted the universe to talk back. But aloneness is a basic premise of our existence, and each of us must discover what we're here for. It's a lonely mission and, like that tiny robot lost somewhere out there in space, we're stuck with it, as individuals and as a species. "People must understand how difficult these things are," said Zimmerman. "Your playing field is the whole solar system and it's full of hazards and unknowns."

We need those hazards and unknowns. The soul by definition thrives on the intangible, the invisible, the inscrutable, and it's our good fortune that the world has been designed in such a way that we're in no apparent danger of comprehending very much at all. There will always be an infinite supply of emptiness into which to project our inquiries and dreams. There will always be our failures, large and small, to compel us to connect ourselves to something greater. And when it comes right down to it, there will always be your aloneness and mine, which prompts us to speak to an unseen G-d.

Ever since man walked on the moon, we might well imagine, when gazing up at that white shining entity, that we've been there, done that. But the moon and its reasons for being are still as foreign to us as Mars, and as unknowable as our own minds. The whole thing – earth, the universe, our own consciousness – is one wall-to-wall carpet of miracles. Our humanity is not to be discovered in our success at getting answers but rather in the persistence of our quest in the face of overwhelming disappointments. We can't refrain, just because we fail to pick up any reply, from turning our hearts once again up to the starry night, and asking again, and asking again, and asking again.

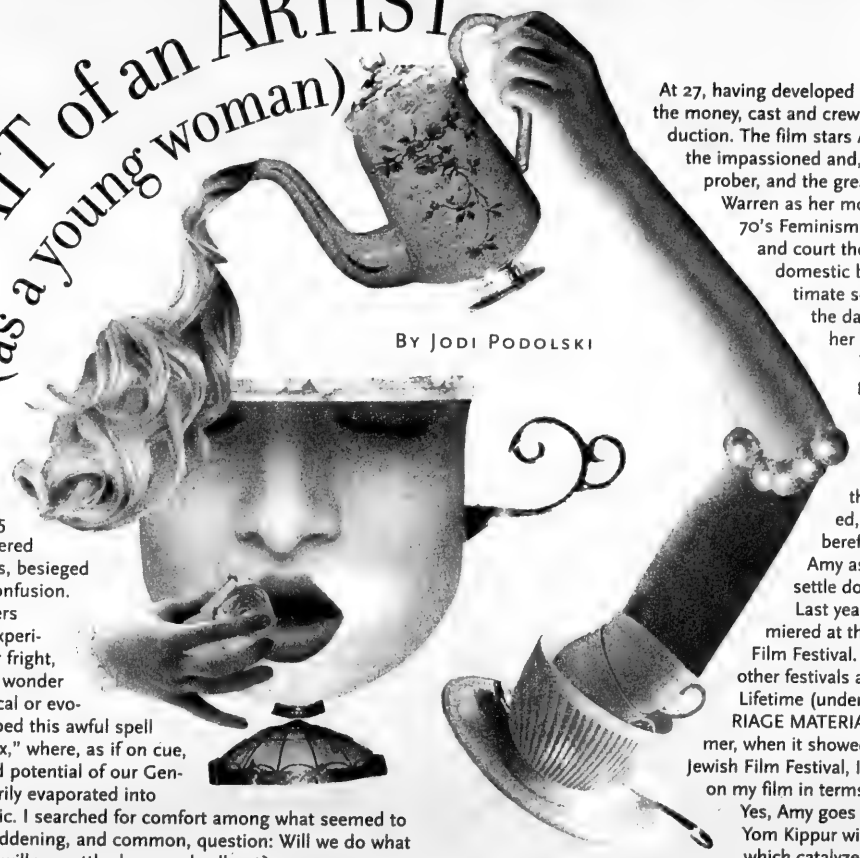
PORTRAIT of an ARTIST (as a young woman)

By Jodi Podolski



When I was 25 years old, I suffered an identity crisis, besieged with fear and confusion. Many of my peers seemed to be experiencing a similar fright, and I started to wonder if it was biological or evolutionary. I dubbed this awful spell "Generation Hex," where, as if on cue, the promise and potential of our Gen-Ex days summarily evaporated into widespread panic. I searched for comfort among what seemed to be the most maddening, and common, question: Will we do what we dreamed, or will we settle down and sell out?

The 25-year slam, I'll call it, shocked me and us with its ruthless and unrelenting leer. Suddenly the mirror shot back a fervent doubt and disbelief, chiding the dreams we had long nursed and our silly insistence that they would come true. Our youth was so indulgent! It allowed us to feel special just for having the ambition! The ambition that would bear fruit "one day." ...But then that "one day" arrives, and it is no more hospitable to you and your "childhood dreams" than the been-around cop who caught you speeding.

This is the most unpleasant revelation. What to do when the cheek-pinched guarantee of your twinkly eyes and infectious smile, your class clown skills and gotta-joke knack, go the way of an expired coupon? It's the fate of the big fish in a little pond, of course, a stale but apt metaphor, when the ocean of adulthood forces you to access and re-assess how badly you want it – whatever "it" may be – and, worse, how truly you deserve to get it.

"What to do when the cheek-pinched guarantee of your twinkly eyes and infectious smile...go the way of an expired coupon?"

To relieve the panic, I did what all 25-year-olds do in LA (if you cannot find a good shrink): I wrote a screenplay. ALL OF IT is the story of Amy Holbeck out to discover her true Self. Professionally, religiously, familially, romantically, the basic tenets of her identity pummel her into a state of gnawing ambivalence. But instead of shrugging it off like so many of her off-screen peers (made numb by drugs and bad sitcoms), Amy fights for answers: What is marriage? With a 50% divorce rate, why bother? Will career leave her empty and alone? Is she happy?

At 27, having developed the script, raised the money, cast and crewed, I started production. The film stars Alanna Ubach as the impassioned and, yes, righteous prober, and the great Lesley Ann Warren as her mother who sat out 70's Feminism to have babies and court the promise of domestic bliss. In the penultimate scene of the film, the daughter confronts her mother:

Why did you let go? Why did she, Glenda Holbeck, sacrifice her Self for motherhood, a job that, once completed, left her feeling bereft? In other words, Amy asks: Why did you settle down and sell out?

Last year, ALL OF IT premiered at the Montreal World Film Festival. It went on to other festivals and then sold to Lifetime (under a new title, MARRIAGE MATERIAL).This past summer, when it showed at the Detroit Jewish Film Festival, I paused to reflect on my film in terms of its Jewishness. Yes, Amy goes home to spend Yom Kippur with her family, which catalyzes the inquiry into her life, her mother, her married sister, challenging job, boyfriend, etc. And yes, Yom Kippur not only encourages but demands the confrontation with the Self.

But from a thematic perspective, I realize now that Judaism played an even more poignant role. Judaism provided the framework for Amy's identity exploration. The who-am-I/what-am-I spasm that set the whole film in motion, literally and figuratively, is in and of itself a Jewish pursuit. The whys it asks, the integrity it demands, the uncompromising command not to settle, to examine reality beneath its radiant front, is a distinctly Jewish process. And the embracing of your otherness, of what makes you different, unequivocally reflects the pulse of Jewish identity.

Today, at 29, the journey of my film is complete. The critics have weighed in (one called it "Bergman with bagels") and, along with future airings on Lifetime, it is selling to territories around the world. On a personal note, I now write full time, and, classically, no longer feel so "hexed" by those confounding issues of Self. It must be evolutionary. But there is a fight that, over time, no matter what, I intend to hold onto: to stay true, just and aware, to be free and to be who I am. It is, in fact, the fight to be a Jew.

By Dennis Prager

high school, I have had two abiding passions – Judaism and music. I have long wondered, however, if there was any connection between the two. This may sound odd. After all, isn't there a natural connection between great music and great religion, specifically between classical music and Judaism? The answer is, Not necessarily. Indeed, in some ways there is more of a natural conflict than a natural connection.

One possible conflict concerns monotheism. The essence of Judaism is the recognition of the one God and the denial of all other gods. A god that is particularly tempting to worship is art – aesthetic beauty can easily present a challenge to the worship of God. Many people in virtually every society, ancient to modern, have worshipped beauty.

The more I have come to love music, the more I have come to understand how easily it, and art in general, can fill a person's life. It is very easy to immerse oneself in the arts, to have them fill one's life, to regard them as giving one's life meaning as well as beauty.

The Torah certainly knew of beauty's power to mislead. The very first story of human disobedience to God describes man and woman as preferring beauty to God. The reason Adam and Eve ate of the forbidden tree – and thus engaged in the only act that could end their idyllic life in the Garden of Eden – was that the fruit of the forbidden tree was "beautiful to the eyes." And the Second of the Ten Commandments prohibits the making of graven images – because it could so easily lead one away from God.

The Torah and Judaism understood that art, music, and aesthetic beauty do not necessarily increase people's morality or holiness. In fact, one of the sad lessons of twentieth century evil is that it is eminently possible to adore art, to be deeply moved by beauty, and be a murderer. The film Clockwork Orange depicted young men savaging people while great classical music played in the background. As its author Anthony Burgess noted, he wanted to deny the "association of great music with lofty morality." He was right. The Nazis, after all, on occasion marched Jews to gas chambers to the music of Mozart and Strauss. And it was, after all, the most cultured country that gave the world Auschwitz.

Stalin, the greatest mass murderer in history, is said to have been listening to his beloved Mozart when he died. At the same time, music has an almost unparalleled capacity to uplift people and, yes, to bring us closer to God. Music, like all art, is morally and theologically neutral. It can elevate and it can degrade. It can lead away from God and it can lead to God.

Let's take some examples of each. It is most unlikely that anyone listening to heavy metal music leaves feeling uplifted, or gentler, let alone closer to God. It is not coincidental that heavy metal concerts sometimes feature violence, or that music at the last Woodstock festival was accompanied by violent behavior. Had that festival featured Bach cantatas, Mozart piano sonatas, or Beethoven quartets, does anyone believe that this music would have precipitated violent behavior? For that matter, if Shabbat melodies had been sung, is it likely violence would have ensued?

The Bible makes it clear that music played a role in the temple service. "Praise God with...harp, trumpets, drums," and other instruments, we are told in the Psalms. Any Jew who has been moved by hassidic nigunim (melodies) or great chazzanut (cantorial prayer) knows how inspiring Jewish music can be in the life of the Jew.

Indeed, in Judaism music is a powerful vessel of worship. Jews do not read the Torah in synagogue, we chant it. Anyone who has ever attended a traditional Jewish wedding knows the power of Jewish music to make the wedding the momentous and festive occasion it should be. In fact, can you imagine a Jewish wedding without music?

Those of us who love God and music know to what extent God's gift of music can bring us closer to God. As a lover of both classical and Jewish music, I feel I am doubly blessed. I can come closer to God on weekdays through Bach and Handel (most of whose greatest oratorios are based on Jewish Biblical themes), and on Jewish holy days through Jewish melodies. On those days, Shlomo Carlebach and Debbie Friedman, to name but two great Jewish composers in our time, are my Bach and Handel.

So, then, what are we to conclude about the relationship between music, Judaism and God? That music is an awesomely powerful tool that can be used to stir Nazi crowds, to lower people to an animal-like level, or to bring us closer to God, to other people, and to feel some of our noblest and deepest emotions. In this way, music is no different from religion itself – it, too, can be used to elevate or lower us. But when used for good ends, few things are more powerful than music.

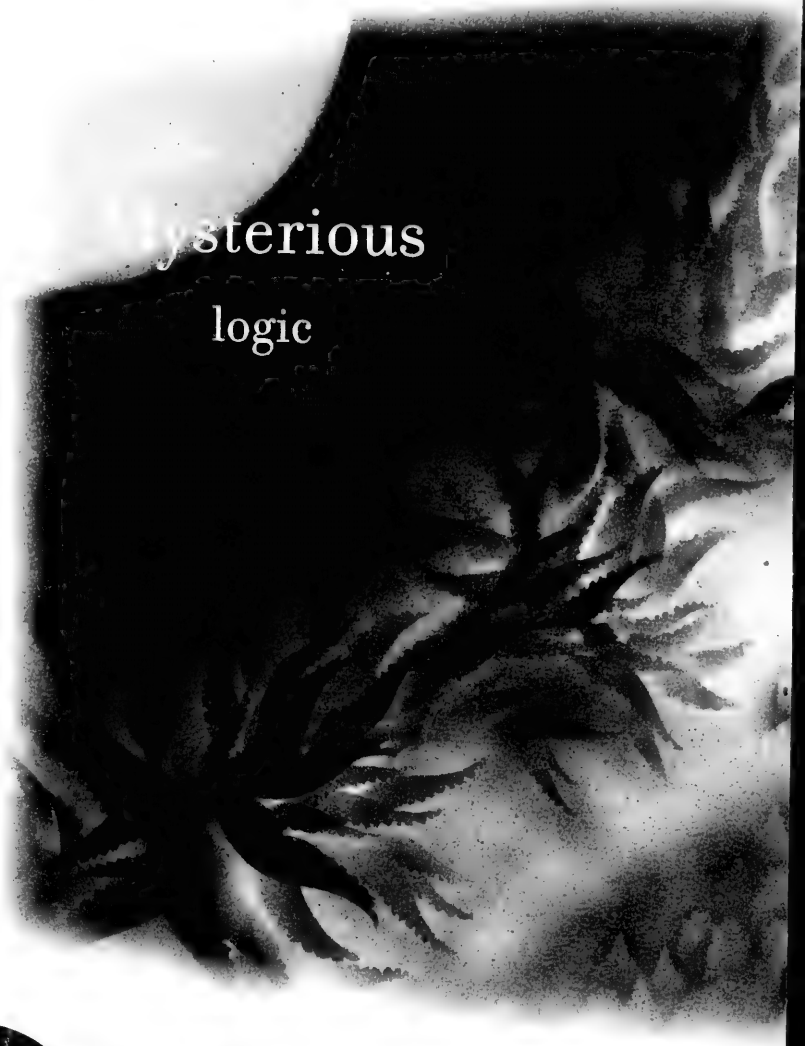
WHAT IS THE COMMON THREAD that runs through materialistic, secular ideologies and religious and mystical beliefs? It is the belief in a Messianic Age. Indeed, the more on the "fringe" one is in the secular world – such as the dogmatic allegiance to Communism – the closer one actually is to an obsession with messianism. Ironically, the Jewish mystical approach to the coming of Mashiach, notwithstanding its characterization as an article of faith, can be approached and viewed from a logical vantage point as well.

What is the basis for secular messianism? Inherent in the mindset of some secular philosophies is the notion that humankind is constantly evolving and that we will eventually graduate into a state that will transcend the egocentric nature of Homosapiens. When this occurs, a state of utopia will follow. Whatever the merits for evolutionary theory in the geological and biological arenas, there is certainly no scientific basis to support evolution as it relates to moral attitudes. If anything, events such as the Holocaust, which occurred in the twentieth century, militate against such an evolutionary philosophy. Yet, despite the absence of scientific and logical support, there are millions of people who have accepted secular messianic beliefs without reservation.

Some schools of psychology will also argue in favor of a messianic belief from its frame of reference. While psychology cannot discuss whether a utopia is possible, it does recognize that when we believe that things will get better, it gives us the ability to cope with life's difficulties. We have to have a belief in a "hereafter" of some kind, in order to make the "here and now" meaningful and worth living.

What is it then about the Jewish version of messianism that some find difficult to swallow? Could it be Judaism's affirmation that a human Messiah will usher in this New Age that has irked some? This would hardly seem to be a problem in light of the fact that throughout history, single individuals inaugurated most, if not all, major movements for good or evil. Is not history replete with leaders who have irrevocably changed its course? To believe that once again a great leader will ignite within us the divine spark that will inspire and challenge all of us to change the world is not unsettling at all.

What some find radical and disconcerting about Jewish messianism, however, is the suddenness with which the world will change. The image conjured up by many believers is one of a mythical, supernatural leader waving the proverbial magic wand that will instantaneously transform our universe, eliminate all vestiges of evil and create a utopian paradise. This image not only strains credulity, it also appears to insult our very humanity. After all, we are not robots or automatons. We do not change by a mere flick of a switch. If we did, we would not be who we truly are. And whatever good came would not relate to us. Indeed, according to Jewish theology, goodness that is not associated with human endeavor is not good in the most precise sense of the word. What good is there in a messianic belief system that speaks of instant, supernatural change?



"Judaism's view is that it is not some fairy tale, or a psychological crutch..."

From the perspective of Kabbalah and Chassidic thought, messianism is, in fact, the very opposite of sudden transformation. It is a process that has taken as many years as humans have inhabited this planet to effect radical changes in the world. Humankind's collective efforts over the course of centuries and millennia have paved the way for a New Age. These changes occur through the observance of good deeds that are referred to in the Jewish lexicon as a mitzvah, G-d's Divine prescription for a good life. Whenever we perform an act of kindness, for example, it leaves an indelible imprint on the world. In their aggregate, these acts have the capacity to utterly transform the world.

If there is a sense of mystery, it is not nearly as much about the Messianic Era as it should be about the nature of a solitary act of kindness. When we reflect on the power of a divinely ordained mode of behavior, it will become clear that there is more energy contained in this act than in any other phenomenon, natural or man-made. This can be demonstrated from several vantage points.

First, the word mitzvah (which we usually translate as commandment or good deed) actually contains another nuance – connection. By performing a mitzvah we create a connection between G-d who is infinite and ourselves who are finite. There can be no greater revolution than bridging that which is unbridgeable. Judaism believes that every time one does a mitzvah, one transforms an intrinsically finite experience into an infinitely divine experience.

Second, the Talmud states and Maimonides affirms that a solitary mitzvah is endowed with the power to alter the balance of the entire universe. If we were to unleash all the fury of all our nuclear arsenals, we could not effect a change as profound and as cosmic as the performance of one solitary act of kindness. In this light, we can hardly imagine the cataclysmic results of all the times people have performed acts of kindness since the beginning of time, particularly those who have lived since G-d revealed Himself at Sinai with the giving of the Ten Commandments.

To be sure, people have also acted cruelly and unleashed untold evil. But, as the masters of Kabbalah have affirmed, evil, by its very nature, does not enjoy the same longevity as the forces of goodness. With the passage of time, the evil of yesterday has already been dissipated, whereas the positive energies endure forever.

From this perspective, the question we should be asking ourselves is, How is it, in light of all the unleashing of positive energy, that the world still appears to be the same? For one who cannot comprehend the possibility of the world changing instantly and who would deem the eventuality of this occurring to be utterly irrational, let him/her reflect on the real enigma instead. How is it that the thousands of years of goodness that the world has experienced have not made the world look drastically different? If there is something irrational about Mashiach, it is not how can we imagine his coming so suddenly, but the reverse. Why hasn't it happened already? Why has the world that has been bombarded with so much positive energy not yet exhibited the changes associated with the messianic utopia?

Jewish messianism is thus the final resolution to the enigma of good not carrying its weight. It is no wonder that Maimonides, the great rationalist, considered the belief in the coming of the Messiah to be one of the principles of Judaism. Despite Maimonides' attempts at reconciling Jewish beliefs with rational thought, he did not feel compelled to reconcile Mashiach with logic. Belief in a messianic outcome is the corollary of all the other theological foundations of Judaism. Once one believes in G-d and His system of cause-and-effect (that good actions leave a positive imprint on the person and the world), it is logically imperative that the world will change.

If the Messianic Age takes us by surprise, it will certainly not be because of some waving of a magic wand. Rather, it is because we are so accustomed to a world that does not follow the rules of logic and our inability to sense the transformations that have been occurring since the beginning of time. The recent collapse of the Soviet Union can serve as an illustration. Outwardly, it appeared as if there was a virtual instant transformation. In truth, the seeds for the demise of the Soviet system had been sown years and decades earlier. While even experts were taken by surprise, we can now all look back and analyze the dynamics of the collapse that have been in motion since the very birth of communism. Similarly, despite the way the onset of the Messianic Age will take us by surprise, we will all be able to look back at the myriad actions that were chipping away, from underneath, at the very roots of evil.

Judaism's view of the Messianic Age, then, is that it is not some fairy tale or a psychological crutch. It is the most rational consequence of centuries and millennia of human efforts that will finally bear their fruit.

The Cosmic Dance

– A Star-Trek through Kabbala and Astrology –

Astrology is the science of cycles; it views life in terms of seasons, time and purpose. In Kabbalistic Astrology, the stars are not seen as the cause of the divine influence but as the messengers or transmitters of God's will. Since we as humans sometimes suffer from "spiritual short-sightedness" we need bigger-than-life monitors to help us understand life. God, being aware of our little handicap, created the heavenly bodies that orbit around the Sun with us, partners in an endless cosmic dance. The stars are like gigantic computer monitors – they are not the computer, nor are they the program; they are merely the spiritual screen that reflects our true nature back to us.

We are approaching a very auspicious date – the fifth of May 2000. That day is crowned by a very rare energetic phenomenon: Seven of the ten planets in our Solar system will align in the same sign, Taurus. Let me try to impress you with numbers: this planetary alignment will not happen again until the year 2675! So we better be prepared because "whatever happens...is a result of this astrological influence...." (See quotation above).

On May 5th, 2000, the seven inner planets – which are the most important: Sun, Moon, Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter and Saturn – will all be in conjunction.

What does that mean? Well, let's look into it. The first thing a conjunction indicates is union, the molding of different energies into a new force. On May 5th, seven planets that can choose to be anywhere in the 360 degrees of the zodiac wheel prefer to squeeze together in a tiny slice of 26 degrees. Think about it, it is as if the stars are telling us, "Hey, humans, if we, the great bodies of heaven, can all fit into a 26 degree wide segment of the skies, you can learn to live together on Earth. If we as great planets can learn to share space, you can do the same."

The second thing these celestial transmitters teach us is to read between the lines, something the Torah also teaches us. We are used to thinking of numbers as little digits that measure quantity. We use numbers to count things. For example; this article has 891 words, Solomon had 1000 wives, etc. But according to the Kabbalah and the science of Gematriah, numbers also describe a certain hidden quality. Number one is the energy of leadership, initiation, unity. Number two describes the quality of duality, relationship, doubts and confusion, and so on. Number 26, the number of degrees the planets will share on the fifth of May, is a very important number. It is the Gematric value of the unpronounceable "Name" of God, the Tetragrammaton. Yod, Hey, Vav, Hey are the letters of the "Name"; these letters form the root to three words in Hebrew: HAYA – that which was (past), HOVE – that which is (present) and YHEYE – that which shall be (future). The "Name" shows us that the true meaning of divinity is beyond time, God being the unity of past, present and future. 26 is also eight because 2+6 equals eight. Eight is the only number you don't have to lift your pen from the paper to write endless times. In math they use the digit eight lying sideways as the symbol for infinity. The seven planets are transmitting the concept of unity in relation to the infinite power of God; all is one and one is all, and that is the only way to realize infinity with our finite minds. That's not all. Astrology combined with Kabbalah is a never-ending story of symbols and synchronicities. Bear with me, as we boldly go where no man has gone before....

Thirteen times two is 26. We all know this, but what are the hidden qualities of this spiritual equation? Well, 13 is the value of the Hebrew word EChaD – One. Unity again! But even more beautiful is the fact that AHaVaH – love – is also 13. Put these two words together – The Love of the One – and the appreciation of the unity of the creation leads us to the true name of God and infinity.

What about Taurus? According to the old Kabbalistic text – "Sefer Yetzirah" or the "Book of Creation" – the sign for Taurus is connected to the energy of the Hebrew letter Vav, "a nail". The earthly energy of Taurus serves to nail and yoke things together, uniting separated entities into one. Once again – unity!

Now let's get practical. We all have to be extra careful with greed, possessiveness and jealousy. These are the dark sides of the energy of Taurus. It is a good time for charity and community work. During the next few months try to give just as much as you receive. Just as in business you have to spend money to make money, as above so below, you have to first give Light so that you can receive Light later on. Watch out for your throat. Taurus rules the throat and neck: Don't hold back the truth, say what is in your heart. Be creative. Taurus is the sign of art and music. Listen to the music, and try to hear the celestial symphony that is always lingering in the skies and than in May is going to be louder then ever.

Whatever you do, remember to enjoy the dance.

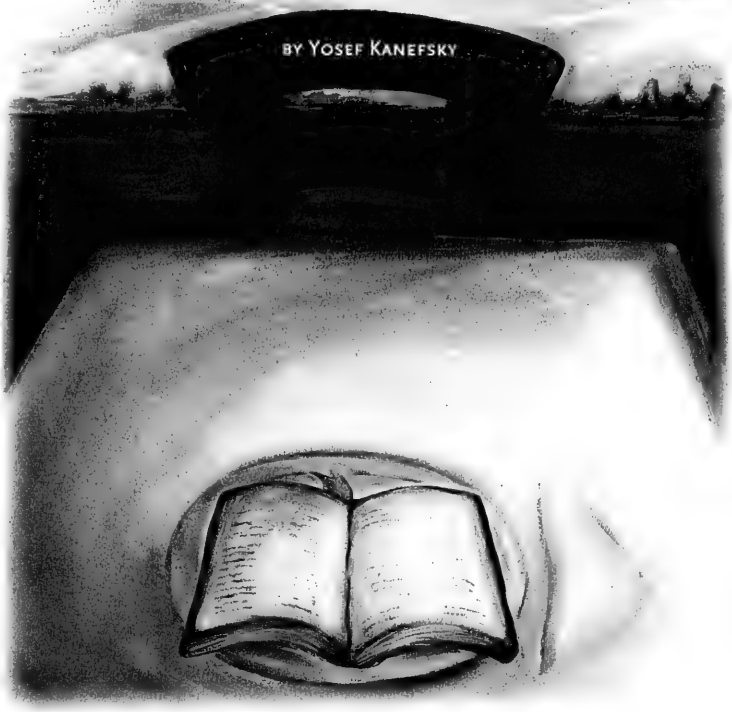
Shabbat on Tuesday

BY YOSEF KANEFSKY



Sure, Shabbat is a terrific thing. To borrow the Talmud's image, it is the special gift that God gave us from His treasure vault. Shabbat gives us time with family and with community. It enables us to carve out time to refresh, to study, to pick up where we last left off in our never-ending search for God and for meaning. I think it's safe to say that our never-say-rest generation is in a position to derive more benefit from Shabbat than has any other in human history. Yet it often strikes me that there's something missing in the way we observe Shabbat. There is often a failure to see the Shabbat forest for its trees.

Let me pose the following questions: If the Jew observes Shabbat and the world doesn't know it, has the Jew observed Shabbat? If the world is unaffected and unchanged by our Shabbat, have we really accomplished God's purpose in having commanded us to observe it? If the answer to these questions is "no" (and I think it is), then there is another vital and exciting dimension of Shabbat that we need to explore.

It's a dimension that we'll call "observing Shabbat on Tuesday". We'll begin by supporting the premise that Shabbat was designed by God to have impact beyond the Children of Israel, and beyond the 24 hours of Saturday. This is done through reminding ourselves of what the core religious experience of Shabbat actually is. As the Torah teaches us repeatedly, the core experience of observing Shabbat is that of mimicking the Divine work schedule. "Six days you shall work, and the seventh is Shabbat unto God. On it you shall do no work, for in six days God created the heavens and earth, and on the seventh He rested."

And toward what end do we replicate, over and over again, this seven-day framework pattern within which God created the universe? It is toward the end of recognizing, ever more deeply with each successive repetition of the cycle, that we are employees in the Divine workshop; employees who have been charged with preserving and enhancing our heavenly employer's project. It is thus on Tuesdays and Thursdays and Sundays that the impact of our Shabbat observance must be felt.

Let's take an example. On Shabbat we do not write. We do not write because we are resting from our creative labor as God rested from His. But the ultimate objective of our refraining from writing on the seventh day is our realization as to how we should write on the other days. Through the consciousness aroused on Shabbat, we come to understand that when we do write, we are obliged to do so in a way that would meet God's exacting standards. We write only the truth and do not obfuscate. We write only well of others, giving them the benefit of the doubt whenever possible. Our writing is free of offensive language and insensitive references. We recognize that we are writing on God's letterhead.

On Shabbat we do not disturb the natural environment. We do not pluck a blade of grass, nor even kill an insect. We leave the earth and its resources alone, for the day is a sweeping expression of our breaking from human industrial activity. Again, though, the objective is not ultimately fulfilled on Saturday. It is fulfilled on Tuesday, when we interact with the natural world that God created and commanded us to subdue. It is fulfilled when we balance our God-given license to bend our environment to do our will, and our God-inspired sense of responsibility to the humans who will inhabit this world after us. In the end, this is the meaningful manifestation of Shabbat observance.

This same approach can be taken to virtually every aspect of technical Shabbat observance. Shabbat is our reminder that God is the project supervisor over all the work we do. Our primary consideration in deciding what we do and how we do it is whether this is the way God wants it done.

Shabbat is a terrific thing. So what are you doing next Tuesday?

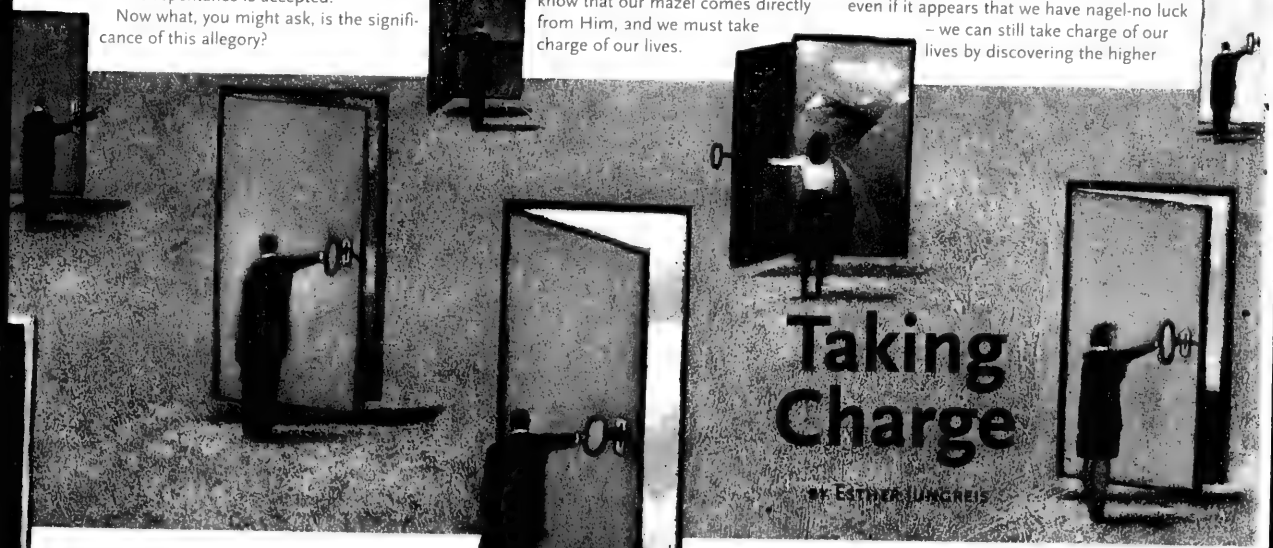
Taking Charge

BY ESTHER JUNGREIS



FROM TIME IMMEMORIAL, PERHAPS OUR greatest failing has been our tendency to shirk personal responsibility. That was the sin of the first man. "The woman whom you gave me – she made me eat from the tree," and that sin of scapegoating continues to plague us today. Everyone is to blame for our predicaments but ourselves. Family, home, environment, school, are all implicated, and we view ourselves as helpless victims. The Torah, on the other hand, maintains that we are all granted free will and are therefore capable of taking charge of our lives.

The Talmud relates the story of Eleazer Ben Dardario, a man of unspeakable decadence, who one day felt a yearning to mend his ways. He called out to the mountains and the hills, the heavens, the earth and the cosmos to intercede on his behalf, but his plea went unheeded. Finally, in anguish, he cried out, "It appears that this matter rests entirely with me. It is only I who can plead my cause," and he wept and wept until a heavenly voice was heard: "Eleazer Ben Dardario's repentance is accepted."

Now what, you might ask, is the significance of this allegory?

Mountains and hills are code words for fathers and mothers. Eleazer Ben Dardario tried to shift blame for his immoral ways to his parents, but the heavenly tribunal would not accept his rationalization, and pointed to the Matriarchs Rachel and Leah, who were the daughters of Laban, a wicked scoundrel. Despite their father, however, Rachel and Leah were the most righteous women of all time and became the mothers of the Tribes of Israel.

Abraham, the first Jew, is another case in point. Terach, his father, was a manufacturer of idols who was willing to see his own son imprisoned. Abraham not only overcame the abuse of his father but he taught the laws of loving kindness to all humanity and proclaimed the one-ness of G-d.

Eleazer Ben Dardario was not about to give in. He tried to place blame on the heavens and the earth, his environment, his school, his friends, but once again, the Heavenly court rejected his excuse and cited Joseph who at the age of seventeen was the only Jew in Egypt (the most decadent country in the world at that time). Despite his personal pain, however, despite his abandonment, despite the compelling enticements of his environment, Joseph did not succumb. Whether in bondage, imprisoned, or as viceroy in the palace of Pharoah, Joseph remained Tzaddik – Joseph the Righteous throughout.

But Eleazer Ben Dardario continued to rationalize. This time, he pointed to the cosmos, complaining that he was born under an unlucky star. Once again, however, his plea went unheeded, for the Torah bears witness that G-d took our father Abraham and propelled him above the stars, so that we might forever know that our mazel comes directly from Him, and we must take charge of our lives.

It was only when Eleazer Ben Dardario came to terms with this that he found the courage to say, "If that be so, it all depends on me."

One of the reasons why so many people have difficulty putting their lives together nowadays is that, like Eleazer Ben Dardario, they too try to rationalize and shift the blame for their failures onto family, environment and fate.

And worse, our cultural ethos would have us believe that we are justified in doing so, that we are bound by the tyranny of our past, that, at best, our struggle is limited, if not in vain.

The message of our Torah comes as a breath of fresh air in this world of hopelessness. Yes, the Torah proclaims, it is possible to overcome a dysfunctional family. Yes, it is possible to transcend your environment, and yes, it is possible to take charge of your life – and this magic transformation takes place through accepting responsibility, through absorbing into our hearts the words of Eleazer Ben Dardario. "Yes, it all depends on me." That is the magic of Tshuva – repentance.

One of the limitations of translating concepts from one language to another is that each language is based on its own unique culture. Therefore, it is not always possible to convey the true essence of the words. Such is the problem with the Hebrew word tshuva, for which there is no parallel in the English language. Tshuva means more than repentance. Tshuva means coming home to your true self, to the realization of the potential that G-d destined for you.

Because of the magic of tshuva, even if we come from a troubled home, even if we have to struggle with a difficult environment, and even if it appears that we have nagel-no luck – we can still take charge of our lives by discovering the higher purpose for which G-d created us. Since we have all been created in His image, our potential is limitless, and it is within our hands to re-mold and re-shape our lives by accepting responsibility and returning to Him.

Why I Pray

BY
Steven Z. Leder

The first time I ever really prayed was the night I returned home from summer camp. I was fifteen. I missed my friends, missed the music, missed the towering, wise rabbis, missed the pretty girls with flowers in their hair on Shabbat, Israeli dancing, and Chassidic stories in the cabin late at night. Alone in my little wood-paneled room in the basement of our modest Minnesota home, I took out the camp siddur, my Bar Mitzvah tallis, and I prayed.

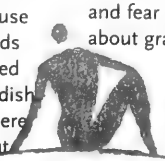
I prayed to overcome my loneliness, my adolescent longings. I prayed to be back with the people I loved.

I still pray to be back with the people I love. When I say "Va-a-nachnu Korim U'mish-ta-cha-vim U'mo-dim," I hear my father, my zaydee and his zaydee. I hear the old men in the shul where I davened in Cincinnati. I hear the Vilna Gaon, the Gerer Rebbe, Menachem Mendel of Kotsk – all singing, "Va-a-nachnu Korim U'mish-ta-cha-vim U'mo-dim."

I prayed as a backpacking college kid standing at the ovens in Dachau. Because there are no words for what happened there, I said Kaddish. We pray when there are no words, but something must be said. To pray is to express the ineffable.

I prayed many years later when my wife was in the hospital after twenty-three hours of labor and things weren't going well. "Hey, if you gotta go now's the time, because we're calling an emergency C-section," the doctor advised. I used my five minutes to sit in the hospital chapel. All my anti-supernaturalism, hyper-rationalism, limited theism was pushed aside in favor of a simple, "Shema Yisrael Adonai Eloheinu Adonai Echad" – Please God, not my wife; not my little boy. Not this time. Please God. Please.

A great rabbi once observed, "We pray when we tremble, gasp for air, flail about wildly to grab at a straw of life. Then is when we catch a glimpse of the miracle of breathing, seeing, touching, hearing, smelling, feeling." We pray when we are afraid, because prayer and fear are both about gratitude.



Then I prayed again, silly as it might sound, that summer, after a friend taught me about growing tomatoes. I planted the tiny sprout of a plant in rich, musty-smelling soil, watered, fed, weeded and waited. One morning I saw it, a tiny green bulb the size of a marble. "Baruch Ata Adonai Oseh Ma-a-se V'reshit—Blessed are you Adonai who made Creation." I said it because I was amazed. I am that sort of person – amazed by a tomato.

To pray is to be amazed; to be aware of – a part of – the unceasing rhythm to which all things dance and sway. To pray out of longing for the people we love, out of longing for our past, out of wonderment, out of fear, with words that say what can not be said, is to reach for and hold none other than God. And in our holding, we know too that somehow, we are gently held.

the box of my father's clothes

BY STEVEN SHER

Reluctantly I hold them up and swear before the mirror
I begin to look more like he did each passing year. His clothes cannot tell us apart. Carefully
I then extend one jacket's empty sleeve into the air the way someone might lead another back into the world.
Down into the cool, long arms
I reach, sleeve by sleeve, pushing one hand then another free beyond the open ends.
My claim, more durable than time.
I imagine, standing straight and proud, how he might have felt in this wool coat. The weight of his arm now on my shoulders, the weight of worry dusted from my back, the past encouraging the present to go forward like a shy but willing child, the child so quickly an adult,
a man so quickly expired.

his arms my arms
my arms his arms

MYSTERIES OF THE SOULMATE

BY YITZCHAK GINSBURGH

The Talmud relates (Yevamot 63b) that it was customary in ancient Israel to ask a newly wed groom: "Have you found or do you find?"

The question refers to an apparent contradiction between two statements of King Solomon, the wisest of men. In the book of Proverbs (18:22) he declares: "He who has found a woman has found good." Yet in the book of Ecclesiastes (7:26) he states: "And I find woman bitterer than death."

Although these two verses seem to convey conflicting images of woman, if we examine them closely we can detect some subtle grammatical differences that will explain the apparent discrepancy. To begin with, the verb in the former verse is in the past tense: "He who has found a woman," whereas in the latter it is in the present tense: "And I find woman."

According to our tradition (Zohar 3:43b), the souls of the truly matched couple derive from a common soul-essence. For this reason, the two are destined even before birth to unite in matrimony. The use of the past tense in affirming the good to be found in marriage suggests that – both in the process of seeking a wife and in relating to the woman he has married – a man should strive to discover and focus on this deep-rooted, shared mutual identification.

Should he ignore this instruction and focus instead on the transient gratification of his immediate desires and predilections – as implied by the present tense employed in the second verse – the relationship will inevitably prove to be a bitter one.

This is further alluded to by the fact that in the first verse, the verb ("he who has found") is followed directly by its object ("a woman"), implying that what the husband has sought and found is indeed his wife. His mind and heart focus on her, and his conscious concern is to meet her needs and the needs of his family, as opposed to his own. This is the foundation of a happy married life.

In the second verse, however (which in the original literally reads: "and find I bitterer than death the woman"), the subject ("I") is interposed between the verb ("find") and its object ("woman"), thereby implying that the man is really more concerned with finding himself – that is, with his own self-gratification.

Thus, selflessness is the key to "finding" and relating to one's wife at the level of their common soul-root. The egocentric husband will be unable to achieve a genuine, mutual relationship with his wife that will sweeten with time rather than grow bitter. Although in such a case the husband is apt to feel that his wife has become "bitterer than death," it is in fact his own interposed "I" (which he projects on her) that has become so. This is indicated by the fact that the phrase "bitterer than death" directly follows the word "I," even before the mention of "the woman."

Let us look at these verses again. The first verse reads in full: "He who has found a woman has found good, and will elicit [good] will from G-d." The second verse reads in full: "And I find woman bitterer than death, for her heart is snares and nets, and her hands are fetters. He who is good before G-d will flee from her, but he who sins shall be caught by her."

In other words, just as King Solomon calls the positive relationship between husband and wife "good," so does he call the flight from a negative relationship "good". The previously self-seeking husband begins his return to the "good" state by reorienting his consciousness such that he stands "before G-d" rather than being concerned solely with himself. By doing this, he "flees from her," that is, from the image of his own ego that he has projected onto his wife. Only then can he proceed to find his true soul-mate.

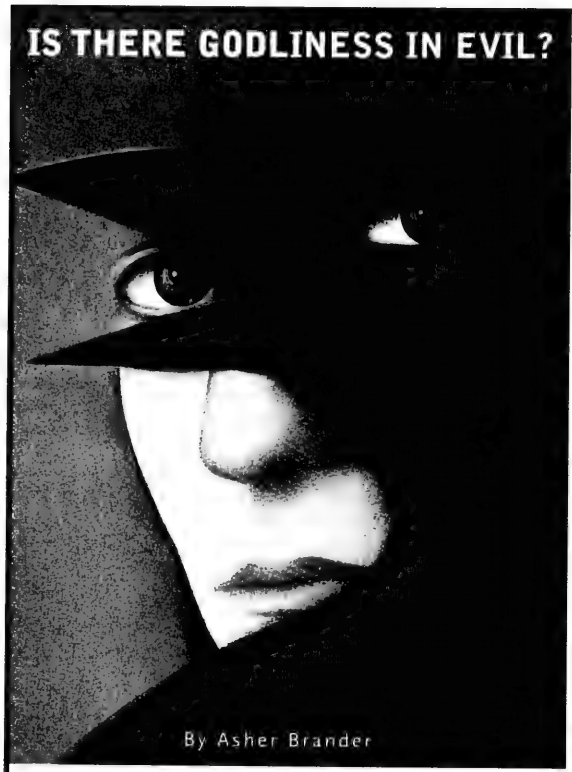
IS THERE GODLINESS IN EVIL?



By Asher Brander

Darth Vader vs. Luke Skywalker, Good vs. Evil, Right vs. Wrong. Our world is fond of simplistic categories. What is good? What is evil? To some, taking the life of a pain-wracked body is ultimate kindness; to others it is evil incarnate. Who is to decide? It is this confusing opposition that religion ultimately seeks to clarify.

One of the great twentieth century Talmudic scholars, Rabbi Joseph Soloveichik, once wrote, "The religious experience is fraught with pitfalls and continual challenge. God...does not relieve the God-seeker of his imperatives but imposes new ones. Religion enriches life, gives it depth...but does not always grant man comfort and complacency. Sanctity is not a paradise but a paradox."

But from this encounter with paradox, we can emerge with great depth and ultimate clarity. Let us demonstrate.

One of the great notions of Judaism is the concept of 'hoq, Hebrew word for a law whose logic defies elementary human comprehension. For example, using the ashes of a red heifer to purify oneself in the Temple is a classic case of 'hoq, while giving charity, an obvious need, certainly is not a 'hoq. A 'hoq is a law based on pure faith, a law with no explanation.

A particularly confounding 'hoq is the prohibition of Sha'atnez, the law that forbids one from wearing a garment that possesses interwoven wool and linen.

The paradox commences – for, if indeed, there were something inherently destructive in this synthesis of wool and linen, why then is the High Priest – Judaism's model spiritual persona while serving in the Temple – obligated to wear garments that are required to contain this forbidden combination? Why must the high priest wear "Sha'atnez", while the rest of us are forbidden to do so?

One of our sages, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, wrote about this mysterious prohibition we call Sha'atnez. Physical life at its very core requires two processes, self- preservation and species perpetuation. Linen serves as a representative of the vegetable kingdom whose sole existence is limited to two functions: sustenance and reproduction. As humans we must also eat and procreate. However, mere physical existence doth not a human make. Yes, I must eat to live, but I dare not simply live to eat.

An animal, on the other hand, possesses a neshama, a spark of instinctive spirituality. Indeed the Talmud declares that in the absence of the Torah, many noble traits could be discerned by observing animal behavior. The cat is modest and the ant industrious, while the penguin is exceedingly loyal. Wool, an animal product, unlike linen, then, serves as a representative of the animal kingdom, which possesses that most basic notion of spirituality.

This is a message to man: Man is urged to ennoble his neshama (soul) and marshal his potential for Divine service, while mastering the egotistic physical drive.

We have unraveled an aspect of the great mystery of Sha'atnez, for the prohibition of Sha'atnez now reflects the collision of two antithetical worlds, a necessary separation between the physical and spiritual realms. A garment possessing Sha'atnez blurs this distinction and crosses the physical/spiritual Mason-Dixon line.

Stop! Does this sound Jewish... or Puritanical? Are the spiritual and physical realms exclusionary clauses, separated by a chasm so wide that never the twain shall meet? But Jews believe in one God!

Consider the most famous Jewish prayer: the Shema. Twice a day, we prod ourselves to serve God bechol levavcha, with "all our hearts." Our Rabbis explain the plural term hearts as inclinations. God implores us to love Him with both our good (yetzer tov) and bad (yetzer hara) inclinations, an apparent oxymoron. How can I love God with my "bad inclination"?

A famous talmudic story says that the Sages prayed to God for the capture of Humanity's old enemy: the Yetzer Hara – the bad inclination. They prayed for mercy, and the Yetzer Hara was handed over to them. God said to them: "Realize that if you kill him, the world goes down." They imprisoned him for three days, then looked in the whole land of Israel for a fresh egg and could not find one (for all of procreation had ceased, even among the animals). Thereupon, the Rabbis said: "What shall we do now? Shall we kill him? The world would certainly go down...."

This talmudic passage may contain the possible resolution to our paradox about the High Priest.

Judaism does not preach: Serve God with your spiritual nature alone, and squelch the physical; nor do we acknowledge an autonomous Satan who runs amok of God. Indeed, even Sin and Sanctity are not divided realms of existence – they emerge from the very same source. Moreover, the Hebrew word for sin, cheit, often refers to an arrow that has missed its mark. For sin is no more than the misuse of one's innate Godly potential, an arrow that has missed its mark.

So our answer to the High Priest's paradox is: An ordinary Jew may not wear Sha'atnez, for it is not easy to harmonize the world of the physical and the world of the spiritual into a holistic Divine service. The High Priest, however, being the spiritual paradigm of the Jewish people, must wear Sha'atnez, for he is empowered to harmonize the dissonance in both worlds.

We may now understand the Rabbi's statement: On Purim, one must be so intoxicated that one is unable to distinguish between cursed is Haman (the villain) and blessed is Mordechai (the hero).

The message of the High Priest wearing Sha'atnez and the message of Purim seem one and the same. That which is perceived as "cursed is Haman" – the evil inclination – when unveiled and understood in the context of God's world can be transformed into "blessed is Mordechai". Those very gallows reserved for Mordechai's execution ultimately provided for the downfall of Haman.

Evil, then, is not a separate and independent entity. Evil is no more than a shadow made to allow us to understand the existence and the power of the ultimate Light.

If I had my life to live over

I would have talked less and listened more.

I would have invited friends over to dinner even if the carpet was stained, or the sofa faded.

I would have eaten the popcorn in the 'good' living room and worried much less about the dirt when someone wanted to light a fire in the fireplace.

I would have taken the time to listen to my grandfather ramble about his youth.

I would never have insisted the car windows be rolled up on a beautiful summer day because my hair had just been teased and sprayed.

I would have burned the pink candle sculpted like a rose before it melted in storage.

I would have sat on the lawn with my children and not worried about grass stains.

I would have shared more of the responsibility carried by my husband.

I would have gone to bed when I was sick instead of pretending the earth would go into a holding pattern if I weren't there for the day.

I would never have bought anything just because it was practical, wouldn't show soil, or was guaranteed to last a lifetime.

Instead of wishing away nine months of pregnancy, I'd have cherished every moment and realized that the wonderment growing inside me was the only chance in life to assist God in a miracle.

When my kids kissed me impetuously, I would never have said, "Later. Now go get washed up for dinner."

There would have been more "I love you's"...more "I'm sorry's" but mostly, given another shot at life, I would seize every minute...look at it and really see it...live it...and never give it back.

RAISING THE SERPENT WITHIN

A Kabbalistic Look at the Biblical Snake

By Michael Ozair

THROUGHOUT history, the serpent has been one of the least understood of Biblical symbols, often described as evil and connected to the forces of temptation. By taking a deeper look at the Kabbalistic teachings behind the story of the Garden of Eden, we discover some astonishing insights about the serpent and its transformative power in spiritual development.

In the Chassidic tradition, one of the essential principles in gaining a deeper understanding of Torah is to use it as a manual to understand the inner psychology of the soul. Every person, place or event in the Torah represents an instinctual human drive or complex. Utilizing this mystical approach, we see that the serpent symbolically represents our primal drive for ultimate fulfillment. In fact, our sages say that the snake was originally intended to be the "great servant of man" (Sanhedrin 59b).

The Kabbalah explains that the serpent had legs before it was cursed. Symbolically this means that the primal drive within each of us initially had the ability to "move and climb" upward in order to reach its ultimate fulfillment – the sacred Divine realm within man. At this pinnacle of consciousness, spiritual bliss became possible. But when the serpent was cursed by God to "lie on its belly and eat of the dust of the earth," the primal drive within us changed drastically and was confined to lower forms of passion.

To understand this profound change, we again turn to the mystical tradition, which explains that the human composition consists of four levels that parallel the four elements of nature: the physical drive (earth), emotional nature (water), intellectual ability (air) and spirituality (fire) (Midrash Rabba BaMidbar 14:12). By removing the serpent's legs and forcing it to slither on the ground, our primal drive was confined to the earthly or physical realm. As a result of the serpent's curse, the primal energy that once impelled us to attain our spiritual potential was now in a natural state of confinement in the lowest energy vortex of the body associated with sexuality: physical passion and lust.

This is why many of the world's traditions have perceived this lower drive as mankind's major obstacle to achieving heightened levels of spiritual consciousness. Consequently, the serpent has been condemned as evil, and passion has been shunned in Western spiritual circles.

Today, the conventional view that calls for the suppression of our sexual or serpent-like energy is fortunately being re-examined with a focus on mystical teachings. The Torah gives us very powerful insights as to how valuable our primal energy can be when it is re-elevated and channeled in the right direction.

For example, when Moses encounters God at the burning bush, he is commanded to drop his staff to the ground and then raise it upwards. This is symbolic of the tikkun, or repair, that is needed for true spiritual evolution. In its fallen state, the staff was a serpent that evoked fear in Moses, but in its raised state it became a staff of God, through which Moses later works miracles (Zohar, Section 1, 27a). This comes to teach us that when our primal urges remain repressed at ground level, we are out of control; but when the same primal energy is raised and transformed, God works miracles through us.

> "Like the snake whose eyes always remain open, there is a part of all of us that is in need of constant stimulation."

By channeling our passions toward the spiritual we can transform a potentially destructive drive into one of our most holy and sacred. But because our passions can so easily be misguided, they must first be filtered through our intellect – our morality and ethics – if we want to achieve the highest Kabbalistic level of human nature – holiness.

In Chassidic philosophy, the yetzer harah – man's evil inclination – is perceived as nothing more than repressed energy that can be transformed when expressed spiritually. The Baal Shem Tov explained that the two Hebrew letters raish and ayin, which spell rah, or evil, can be reversed to spell the Hebrew word er, which means awakened. The yetzer ha'er would translate as the "the overly awakened inclination".

Like the snake whose eyes always remain open, there is a part of all of us that is in need of constant stimulation. Therefore, when we are not participating in some form of spiritual expression like song, dance, art, music or mysticism, the overly awakened inclination within us will be forced to seek stimulation through other avenues, most often detrimental ones.

Our sages explain that when two Hebrew words have the same numerical value, they are of the same essence on a more subtle and hidden level. Perhaps this is why the Hebrew words mashiach (messiah) and nachash (serpent) have the same numerical value of 358. While on the surface they seem to represent the two diametrically opposed forces of good and evil, they are related in their essence. In fact, our tradition explains that when the Messianic era arrives, our primal drive for lust and physical gratification will be 'removed' and everything will be transformed to complete good. Figuratively, this means that our passions will be elevated, the serpent will no longer be coiled and confined, and the primal drive within us will return to its original state of seeking ultimate fulfillment in a life of Divine living (Tikunei Zohar 21 (43a), 13 (29b)).

As for today, the message is clear. Life is a celebration to be lived, and when we deny our own natural instincts, we deny the very human glory within us; we deny life itself. If we allow our passions and desires to increase in spiritual and creative expression, we can truly blossom. Those of us who allow our primal energy to emerge will enter the doorway to the Divine, travel the road back to the Garden and experience the return to the Temple of God.

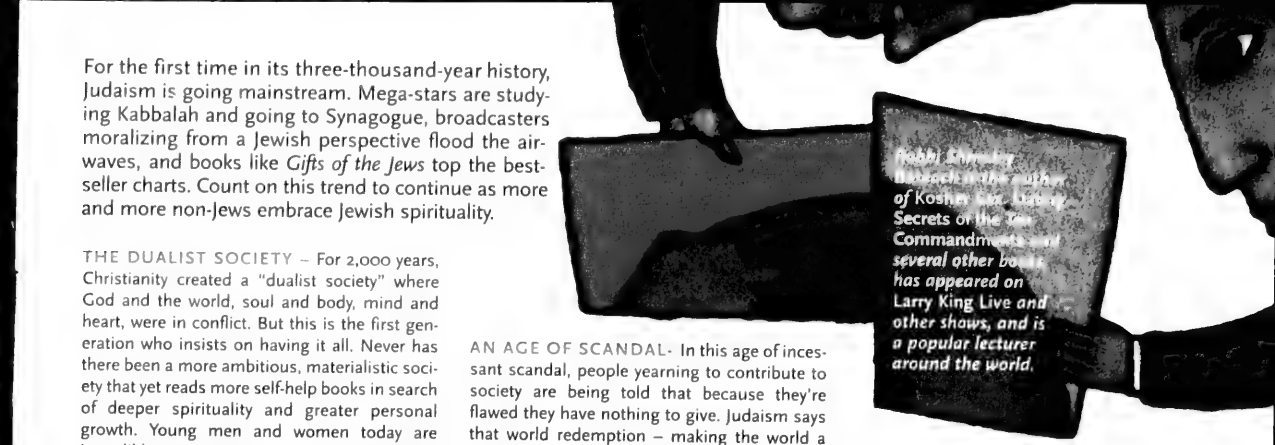
Is The World Becoming More Jewish?



Rabbi Shmuley Boteach is the author of Kosher Sex, Kabbalah Secrets of the Ten Commandments and several other books has appeared on Larry King Live and other shows, and is a popular lecturer around the world.

For the first time in its three-thousand-year history, Judaism is going mainstream. Mega-stars are studying Kabbalah and going to Synagogue, broadcasters moralizing from a Jewish perspective flood the airwaves, and books like Gifts of the Jews top the best-seller charts. Count on this trend to continue as more and more non-Jews embrace Jewish spirituality.

THE DUALIST SOCIETY – For 2,000 years, Christianity created a "dualist society" where God and the world, soul and body, mind and heart, were in conflict. But this is the first generation who insists on having it all. Never has there been a more ambitious, materialistic society that yet reads more self-help books in search of deeper spirituality and greater personal growth. Young men and women today are incredibly career-oriented and self-indulgent. They work themselves to the bone so that they can shop, vacation, and indulge in a materialistic frenzy of cars and techno-gadgets. But on their vacations, while they bronze their bodies, they sit on the beaches and read books like The Road Less Traveled and Care of the Soul. As they surf the web and check in on stuff of questionable modesty, they also register with content-oriented sites that teach them how to maximize their spiritual potential.

Judaism is the perfect spiritual model for "Generation X," the "X" representing the confluence of the spiritual and material modalities. In Jewish spirituality, the objective is to create heaven on earth. You want to be rich? The Jewish message is not "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God (Matthew 19:24)." Rather, the message is, Aspire to become a billionaire. Just give a lot of charity. You love sex? No problem. Have it - but with your spouse.

AN AGE OF NOISE-In this era of cell phones, beepers, email, Internet and fax machines, people are rarely afforded a moment of solitude. Get ready to see an increasing number of non-Jews creating a Jewish-style Sabbath by setting aside one family day each week in which they don't answer the telephone, turn on the TV, or surf the net. If you think this is exaggerated, take the millennium eve, which fell on Friday night, the Jewish Sabbath. On the biggest party night in a thousand years, most Americans stayed at home, away from the hype.

AN AGE OF SCANDAL- In this age of incessant scandal, people yearning to contribute to society are being told that because they're flawed they have nothing to give. Judaism says that world redemption – making the world a better place – comes before personal salvation. Bill Clinton's having survived Monica Lewinsky was an example of the triumph of Jewish over Christian values. Most of the Christian clergy were calling for his head because in Christianity, faith and being a good person comes before making a better world. But the American people rejected this, saying, "He's doing a good job, let him stay." Oscar Schindler was a man known for womanizing, drinking, and other scandalous behavior, while Hitler was impeccable in his personal life – never smoked, drank, or cheated on Eva Braun. But contrast their respective contributions to the world.

AN AGE OF LONELINESS – Loss of intimacy is a primary characteristic of the modern world. There are more broken relationships and more loneliness than ever before. Divorce in the United States has reached 63 percent of all marriages since 1980. People work harder than ever, neglecting spouses and children in the process. The Jewish emphasis on family, community, and respect for parents is a wholesome remedy.

REDISCOVERING THE LITTLE THINGS– Embraced by pop icons like Madonna, the Kabballah teaches us to embrace little sparks of everyday experience and the seemingly insignificant moments. Modern existence is an ongoing search for fireworks displays. People get bored incredibly fast and will do anything to overcome the drudgery, even being prepared to sit for hours on end in front of a television for a bit of banal entertainment. What has been lost is a down-to-earth appreciation for the simple joys of reading, playing with children, humming inspiring melodies, and taking long strolls by the riverside.

But the mystical side of Judaism reminds us that there are spiritual sparks scattered from the majestic mountain peaks even to the slums of the inner city. Kabbalah conditions man to discover the electricity of simple undertakings like prayer, kindness, and friendship.

SEX AND RELATIONSHIPS–Jewish teachings on how to sustain passion and engender greater intimacy in relationships is perhaps Judaism's best-kept secret. Today, hundreds of non-Jewish couples have begun to institute a period of sexual separation in their marriages just like religious Jewish couples. Likewise, they warmed to the Biblical message of rediscovering sex as the highest form of knowledge that can sew two strangers together as one flesh.

A Jewish wave is coming, with many non-Jews already surfing. It's gonna make a big splash in all the world's cities. The only question is: How many Jews will surf with them?

My Beloved Mechitzah
BY JOELLE KEENE

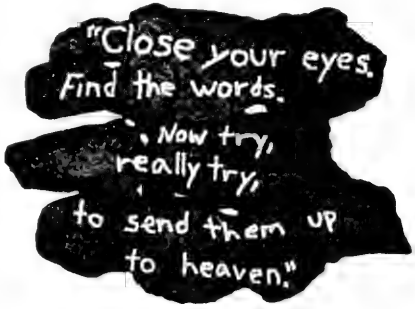
I didn't know these lovebirds, but there they were, unmistakably just that, standing at Sabbath morning services amid a sea of men and women with his arm around her waist, she leaning into his shoulder and the two of them swaying gently back and forth to the sound of the prayers. How nice, I thought, that they're learning Torah together. Where it will take them no one can say, but they're together on a great and splendid journey.

Since then my own journey, begun in part in that same room, has led me to a place where I could not possibly stand in prayer with my husband's arm around my waist. Praying might just be the most important thing we humans do, setting the stage for all of the rest of our behavior, but it is not the easiest. For most of us it takes tremendous concentration, a great erasing of everything outside and at the same time a bringing of everything we are into one small moment framed by a particular piece of ancient text. The problem is that love is so powerful – especially love for a spouse, but even premonitions of love like crush and curiosity – that in any given moment, prayer cannot compete.

Perhaps that's why Jewish tradition invented something called the mechitzah, surely the most widely maligned – I would say misunderstood – of any institution in Judaism today. A mechitzah, literally "separation", is a screen or other barrier in a traditional synagogue that separates women from men during worship; in this separation, some say, the women are demeaned. The religious idea is that men should not be able to see women while they're praying, for if they do, their prayer will not be heard. To me, that's not demeaning; it's a statement of obvious fact. It's hard enough to pray when you're alone.

Try this exercise: Imagine that you need to speak with God. Imagine that you need something very, very badly, and that God really is all – powerful and the only One who can grant it to you. Or imagine that you've done something terribly wrong and need some great forgiveness, or that your first child has just been born and you want to offer thanks. Close your eyes. Find the words. Now try, really try, to send them up to heaven.

Could you do this while cuddling with your spouse? Could you do it while ogling the latest beauty to join the shul, or that guy you see each Saturday who's so cute it makes you laugh? Maybe you could – everyone's different – but I strive mightily just to sense God's listening when I pray.



Sometimes I picture great tree-limbs, an overarching Father seeing every word and deed, or see myself as human clay addressing Him who formed it. Or I conjure up an awesome, holy Throne bathed in rays of light, considering with mercy my so tiny, distant plea. Yet with all these tools and more, still it's hard. We need all the help we can get.

And so we have a curtain – to center us perhaps, to make a place that forms a space where we can pray. There are as many kinds of mechitzahs as there are shuls – I've seen sleek wood carved in modern shapes, and balconies where height is the mechitzah, and gathered lace on curtain rods that roll.

But all mechitzahs hold us back from one another and group our prayers by gender rising heavenward. Perhaps this helps God hear us, too; perhaps we sound clearer, are more ourselves, unmediated by our opposites. Judaism loves categories and celebrates them every way – night and day, milk and meat, Sabbath versus holidays and ordinary days – and gender's no exception.

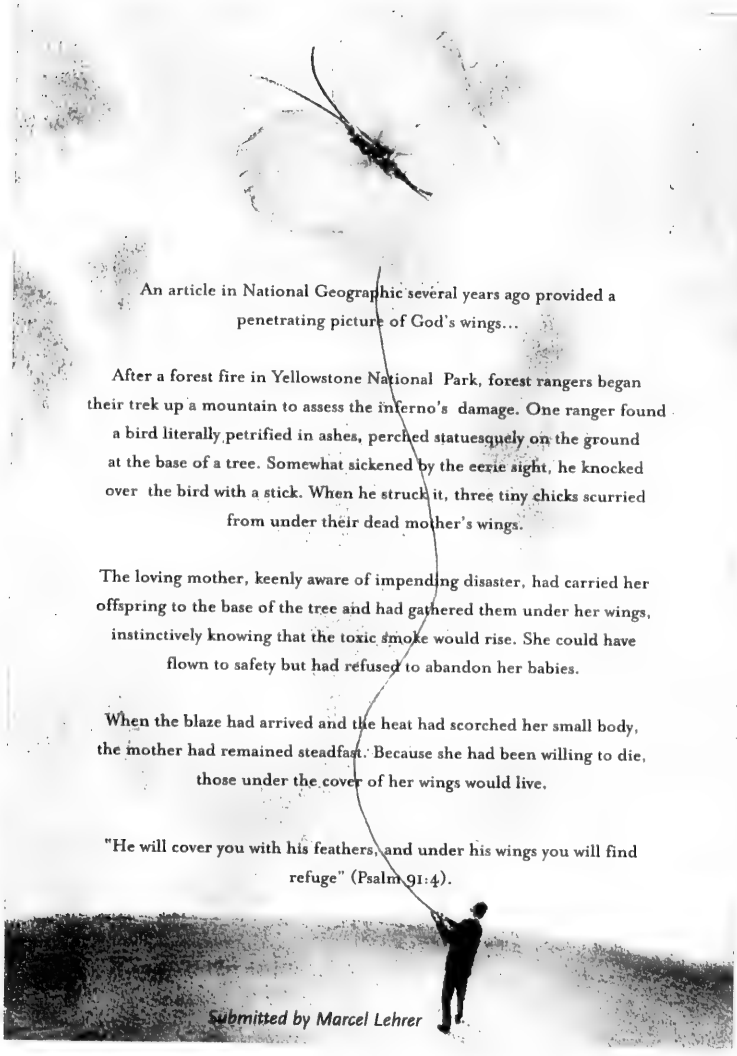
The men's section is front and center because men have more ritual commandments in the synagogue, while women are responsible for bringing Torah into the home. Shul becomes one place where we can be with our own gender, something not without a pleasure all its own.

So you can say the mechitzah exists to keep women out, that the genders are identical and all else is cultural conceit. For many of us, though, the mechitzah opens a door in, perhaps into a more concentrated experience of who we are and certainly into the presence of God where holiness and much direction lie. In prayer, we reach outside our earthly yearnings and search for something different, something that ennobles us, sets our sights high and improves us from the inside out. In love, we find an outlet for those improvements, for our goodness, kindness, generosity. Love is arguably our most God-like activity, and also our greatest earthly reward; in its physical expression, it is said to bring God's presence to rest on us directly. Each paves the way for the other; I'm a better wife for praying, and drawn closer to God through the love my marriage brings. Each creates a chasm we can cross.

And so I wonder again about those Sabbath lovebirds, trying to make their yearnings heard above the din of daily life, studying Torah and singing psalms, arms linked, perhaps journeying down paths deep into wisdom.

There's no one way to pray, and none of us can say for sure whose prayers are heard. But perhaps their love has grown so much that they can't sit together in services anymore, or their love for God has grown in such a way that they don't want to. Maybe it would take more than a curtain to keep them apart – and perhaps just a curtain to link them.

Joelle Keene, a former newspaper reporter and music critic, writes about God in daily life for Jewish publications around the United States. She is currently writing a book on character development for teenage girls. She previously worked as a reporter for the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner and the Seattle Times.



An article in National Geographic several years ago provided a penetrating picture of God's wings...

After a forest fire in Yellowstone National Park, forest rangers began their trek up a mountain to assess the inferno's damage. One ranger found a bird literally petrified in ashes, perched statuesquely on the ground at the base of a tree. Somewhat sickened by the eerie sight, he knocked over the bird with a stick. When he struck it, three tiny chicks scurried from under their dead mother's wings.

The loving mother, keenly aware of impending disaster, had carried her offspring to the base of the tree and had gathered them under her wings, instinctively knowing that the toxic smoke would rise. She could have flown to safety but had refused to abandon her babies.

When the blaze had arrived and the heat had scorched her small body, the mother had remained steadfast. Because she had been willing to die, those under the cover of her wings would live.

"He will cover you with his feathers, and under his wings you will find refuge" (Psalm 91:4).

GOING HOME

There is something compelling about "going home". "Home" immediately evokes the image of a safe haven; feelings akin to what the womb must have felt like – warm, secure, wanted and cared for; a sense of belonging to something greater than oneself.

"Home is where the heart is," proclaims the popular adage. But why is it that even as we move on to supposedly bigger and better things – careers, marriage, children and grandchildren – the longing for one's childhood "home" persists?

An anecdote is told of a post-war refugee family transferred from place to place in search of settlement. On one occasion, the family was standing in a train station surrounded by their tattered suitcases, boxes and bags when a bystander approached the family's six-year-old daughter and remarked, "You poor darling, moving about so much with no place to call home." The little girl looked up in surprise. "You are mistaken," she replied "I do have a home. I just don't have a house to put it into."

Clearly, a "home" has little to do with structure, bricks and mortar or the accoutrements of furniture and drapes. It has everything to do with the spirit which fills it.

The Midrash teaches that our Patriarchs envisioned Mount Moriah, site of Israel's holy temple, in different ways. Abraham called it a "har", a mountain, an awesome place that would challenge his descendants, test their resolve, and evoke the "akeida" greatness within them. Isaac called it a "sadeh", a field where one might, in the context of undisturbed nature, seek the solitude that would facilitate a relationship with the Infinite. Jacob, father of the twelve tribes, designated this holiest space on earth as "bayis" – a home.

In describing the place where G-d and man would meet as a home, Jacob defined its essence. He acknowledged the validity of Abraham and Isaac's views, but insisted that both challenge and solitude require the support of a home for their success. The Midrash concludes that G-d preferred Jacob's designation over the others. And so, a home it has ever been.

Indeed, more than anything else, a home is a sanctuary for the spirit, where one's soul can touch base with its Source, the Master of the Universe.

Today, while we no longer have our holy Temple, we do have our homes. Our sages advise that in the Temple's absence, the special vessels that filled the historic house of G-d in Jerusalem be symbolically replicated in our homes. The menorah, the candelabra of the Bais Hamikdash, symbolizes the oral tradition – the creative moral energy that maintains the relevance of Jewish values in our homes. The "shulchan", the golden table with the wondrous, ever-fresh show bread, represents our material sustenance, which must be appreciated so that we feel no need to indulge in excess. The "mizbayach" or altar, the site of the daily offerings, signifies the sacrifices demanded of family members to transcend their personal wants in deference to the needs of others. Finally, there is the Holy of Holies, the sublime inner sanctum, which speaks to immutable moral principles, and through its "cherubim", symbolizes the intimate relationship between husband and wife.

"G-d created woman with a Binah Yesaro, a special dimension of understanding and intuition."

Perhaps of utmost relevance today is the critical service performed by the kohain (priest), the religious functionary who served as the tabernacle's homemaker. In the Temple's current manifestation, it is the woman who, in large measure, has assumed the responsibilities of the kohain. She is the architect of the lofty center of life and, like the priestly kohain of old, creates the spirit, ambiance, quality and energy of the tabernacle entrusted to her care.

The Talmud explains that G-d created woman with a "Binah Yesaro", a special dimension of understanding and intuition. Contemporary thinker Ashley Montague, in his book The Natural Superiority of Woman, echoes this thought, referring to woman's "genius of humanness." By all accounts, G-d graced women with a special capacity for relationships, thus equipping them to be His delegates, the builders of the most sacred spaces on earth – our homes.

History has proven time and again that the home is the pivotal factor in our national survival and the key to the redemption of our people. Our sages teach that it was in the merit of Jewish women, who transformed their homes into bastions of courage and morality, that our ancestors were redeemed from slavery in Egypt.

All of which begs some critical questions: How is it that we have allowed this most remarkable agency, the home, to become devalued in our time? How is it that we have allowed the role of women, the home's primary force, to be denigrated? How have we permitted the secular world with its idolatry of self to convince us that there can be a more worthwhile calling than creating places of loving, caring and belonging? How have we permitted our culture to convince us that a role that creates a link in an eternal chain can be an inferior vocation? And how did we let our society persuade us that bringing redemption to humanity is not the ultimate in gratification?

In the last analysis, home exerts a powerful influence, shaping past, present and future. The need to "go home" is part of the human condition and will inevitably confront us all during our lifetimes. The implication for women – G-d's appointed stewards over this sacred space – is that they hold the vital key to mankind's success and the realization of the world's destiny.

It was the last night of Pesach and in the Jewish shtetl of my Casablanca the sweet smell of mufletas caressed the opened doors of every home. Legend has it that since every family had some customs special to that family, all the doors were opened to share them with the neighborhood. Thirty-five years and 6,000 miles later, I dream to see this ancient tradition evolve into a way of life, where the sharing of one night becomes an event for all people and for all time.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow

Will coordinate growing needs of expanding community

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — UJA FEDERATION will launch Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) to its senior staff, volunteers and JTT partners this Sunday at the Kiever synagogue, a location with strong echoes of Jewish Toronto's yesterdays.

The project represents a co-ordinated plan to address the needs of the Toronto area's growing Jewish community, including a burgeoning Jewish population in York Region (currently 50,000 people, and expected to reach more than 75,000 over the next decade).

With the recent purchase of a 50-acre lot on the southwest corner of Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue in Richmond Hill (just south of Major Mackenzie Drive), UJA FEDERATION has taken a long-planned step toward meeting the needs of York Region's Jewish community.

Artist's rendering of the interior of the new community complex in York Region.

As part of the JTT initiative, the York region lot is designated as the northernmost of three Jewish "campuses" in the Toronto area.

The other two are located downtown, centred around the Bloor JCC, and on Bathurst Street, north of Sheppard Avenue, the site of the Lipa Green Building and the Bathurst Jewish Centre, which will be expanded together with partner agencies.

Jurists meeting in Canada

TORONTO — For the first time in its 31-year-history, the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists will hold its international conference here, Aug. 13 to 16.

The conference, which is expected to attract 1,000 lawyers, judges and legal academics worldwide, "will provide an important occasion to debate major legal and social issues on the Jewish agenda," said Igor Ellyn, Toronto conference chair and IAJLJ vice-president.

Plenary sessions will consider such issues as crimes against humanity, combatting electronic anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial and how Jewish and Israeli issues are portrayed in the international media.

A keynote luncheon address will be given by Yossi Beilin, Israel's justice minister. Another will be delivered by Justice Rosalie Abella of the Ontario Court of Appeal and Prof. Irving Abella, director of Judaic studies at York University and past president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Irwin Cotler, of McGill University's faculty of law said "the conference will consider compelling issues presented by some of the world's best respected experts. Lawyers and jurists, especially those who have not been to an IAJLJ conference should make it a point to be there."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Objection to Protocols

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada has expressed outrage that reputable online booksellers are selling the infamous anti-Semitic forgery The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion. Barnes and Noble, Amazon.com and Borders all sell the scurrilous tract, written by the Czarist secret service in the early 20th century to propagate a Jewish world conspiracy. The Protocols were a popular text under the Nazis. Barnes and Noble and Amazon.com recently reclassified the text as hate literature rather than Judaica, and have posted a disclaimer from the Anti-Defamation League. B'nai Brith says Borders has refused to take this step.

Tay-Sachs Clinic

VANCOUVER — A screening clinic for Tay-Sachs disease was held last week at the Jewish Community Centre here. Those who attended were also offered a test for Canavan disease, a similar disorder. Tay-Sachs is said to be 100 times more prevalent among Jews than in the general population.

ISRAEL

Jiang's Visit

JERUSALEM — China's President Jiang Zemin plans to visit Israel and the Palestinian self-rule areas in the first such trip by a Chinese head of state. Jiang will visit April 12 to 27 on a trip that will also take him to Turkey, Greece and South Africa.

Minister Beaten

JERUSALEM — Six armed Palestinians stormed into the office of the Palestinian Authority's environment minister and beat him. The motive for the assault on Youssef Abu Safieh was believed to be revenge.

Yemeni Overtures

JERUSALEM — The president of Yemen says his country would establish diplomatic relations with Israel once a comprehensive Middle East peace settlement is achieved. Ali Abdullah Saleh also said Israeli and other Jewish tourists are welcome to visit Yemen. But Yemen's UN ambassador later clarified that only Israelis of Yemeni descent would be welcome.

WORLD

Probe of Shul

PHILADELPHIA — The FBI has joined an investigation of alleged embezzlement from a Philadelphia-area synagogue. According to officials at Temple Sinai in Dresher, Pa., at least $700,000 was taken from the congregation during a seven-year period and diverted to an account reportedly controlled by the shul's former executive director, who was fired, along with the synagogue's bookkeeper.

New Jewish Centre

RIO DE JANEIRO — A new Jewish centre has opened here. The centre, run by the Lubavitch movement, includes two synagogues, a library and mikvahs for men and women.

Cemetery Reopens

BEIJING — A Jewish cemetery in the northeastern Chinese city of Harbin has been cleaned up and reopened, Chinese state media reported. At the start of the 20th century, Harbin was home to more than 20,000 Jews, who founded the cemetery in 1903.

Holocaust Charges

BERNE — A Swiss man who denies the Nazi gas chambers existed went on trial in Lausanne on charges of racial discrimination. Gaston-Armand Amaudruz, 79, faces a maximum sentence of three years in prison.

Pollard Movie

NEW YORK — One of the stars of television's Seinfeld is taking on the role of a spy for Israel. Jason Alexander, who appeared as George Costanza in the NBC hit, is slated to play Jonathan Pollard in an upcoming film on Showtime. Pollard is serving a life sentence in the United States for spying on behalf of the Jewish state.

New RA President

PHILADELPHIA — A rabbi from the Chicago area was named president of the Conservative movement's rabbinical arm. Rabbi Vernon Kurtz, elected president of the Rabbinical Assembly at the organization's 100th annual convention here, will serve in the position for two years.

Brothers Charged

LOS ANGELES — Two brothers previously charged with murdering a gay couple were arraigned last week on charges of torching three synagogues near Sacramento. Benjamin Matthew Williams, 31, and James Tyler Williams, 30, pleaded not guilty to last June's arson attacks, which caused more than $1 million in damage.

Holocaust-Denying Teacher Fired

WARSAW — A Polish professor convicted last year of Holocaust denial was fired from his university and banned from teaching elsewhere in Poland for the next three years.

The state-run University of Opole said Dariusz Ratajczak had violated ethical standards with the publication of his book Dangerous Topics, in which he wrote sympathetically about published material that deny the Holocaust occurred.

Ratajczak, 37, said he would appeal the decision.

He had already been suspended from his teaching post at Opole last spring following protests over the book.

Prosecutors opened an investigation and Ratajczak went on trial for violating a new law banning the denial of Nazi and Communist-era hate crimes.

In December, a court in Opole found him guilty of spreading revisionism, but did not punish him, saying the limited distribution of the book did not prove it to be a "social threat." The court said Ratajczak had criticized the view of Holocaust revisionists in a second edition of the book.

Canadian rabbis split over Reform resolution

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Conservative, Orthodox movements reject same-sex ceremonies

TORONTO — Canadian rabbis are split over the resolution passed by a collegium of Reform and progressive rabbis that gives them the option of presiding at same-sex commitment ceremonies.

The resolution, which will have an impact on the movement's 1,800 rabbis across North America, was passed by the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR), which met recently in Greensboro, N.C.

This is the first time, said Rabbi Paul Menitoff, executive director of CCAR, that a major religious body has indicated support for any of its clergy who decide to officiate at same-gender ceremonies.

Rabbi Paul Golomb, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, said some rabbis in Canada will give the resolution serious consideration, and will officiate at the ceremonies, if asked.

"The resolution itself is modest and balanced. It states a clear respect for rabbis who might choose not to officiate, but also calls upon a report of a CCAR task force on human sexuality that had proposed that lifelong unions between two homosexual Jews might be considered sanctified.

"The resolution can neither promote nor discourage a rabbi's role in the sanctification of a same-sex union. It can only state that it is a legitimate and Jewishly grounded choice," said Rabbi Golomb.

Rabbi Dow Marmur, spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple, said the resolution is mild and conciliatory. "It recognizes a desire to have a ceremony but does not call for marriage, and it does not mandate rabbis to perform the ceremony.

"I am still not in favour, however, because it is not for rabbis to dispense blessings. I understand where [these couples] come from, but Jewish tradition does not have room for it," he said.

We must champion on behalf of gays and lesbians, said Rabbi Marmur, "and a just society must treat them equally, but we have to make a distinction between justice and holiness.

"I believe in equal rights, but when it comes to holiness I find it impossible to sanctify the relationship within the framework of Judaism."

There really is no consensus of opinion in Canada, said Rabbi Lawrence Englander of Solel Congregation in Mississauga. "There are those who officiate at the ceremony and see it as a wedding, those who see it as a union and a commitment, and those who will not sanctify the union at all.

"Every Reform congregation would welcome the couples as part of the congregation, but as for seeking a commitment ceremony, they should consult their own rabbi.

"Personally, I would officiate [at these ceremonies] because I see a lifelong, monogamous commitment to a Jewish partner as being as important in a homosexual couple as in a heterosexual couple. Assuming there will be children in the relationship, they should also be raised as Jews. I support these values in heterosexual and homosexual unions."

Rabbi Leigh Lerner, rabbi of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, Montreal's only Reform congregation, said he will not consider officiating at such ceremonies until he has obtained a legal opinion on how Quebec law views them.

The temple has not taken a position yet on commitment ceremonies for gay and lesbian couples, he said, but has modified its bylaws to allow such couples to become members.

Literary encounters

From the editor's desk

This column is the last entry of observations from the Eighth International Jewish Media Conference I attended last month in Jerusalem. My notes could yield a continuous stream of columns for weeks to come, but Pesach approaches and it is time to move on.

On our first Shabbat of the conference, some six weeks ago, some of my colleagues and I spent the afternoon in what the organizers called a literary encounter, in the company of four engaging Israeli authors.

They were a diverse mix of artists: different in backgrounds, personalities and ages. And it seemed to me that each was happy to be meeting with us, a similarly diverse mix of journalists from quite distant, but as it turned out, not so unfamiliar places.

The point of the "encounter" was simply to meet one another, shmooze and pass the last few hours of Shabbat in one another's company. They spoke to us informally, each in turn separately, telling us a little bit of their respective pasts and a little bit more of their respective passion for their work.

We sat around a number of tables, a small group, sipping cold water, listening, asking questions, unaware that outside the sun was falling quickly behind the trees on the western ridge of the city.

Shifra Horn was the youngest of the four, born in Jerusalem, I would guess in the late '50s. Her father was an Ashkenazi who "survived" the gas chambers. Her mother was a Sephardi, whose family harkened back several generations in Jerusalem.

Horn is a widely read novelist whose books distil into storyline and character the unique blending forces that comprise her soul.

Yossel Birstein, an octogenarian raconteur and novelist, regaled us with delightful tales of his youth in Poland, of his immigration to Australia and of his subsequent aliyah to Israel.

Dressed tout en noir, he looked and sounded like a bohemian zayde. His works have been translated into several languages. Among the feelings he shared with us was the special sense of wonder and appreciation he felt when he saw his writing translated into Chinese.

The borders of literature, he told us, are borders of the heart and of the imagination.

Eli Amir is a good friend of Birstein, though somewhat younger. He was born into an economically comfortable family in Iraq and came to Israel during the harsh economic period of unemployment and rationing soon after the birth of the state. Poet, essayist, novelist, he too was dressed in black that afternoon, as if he and Birstein had co-ordinated their wardrobes to form a visual unity to match their spiritual one.

Both men took turns telling us of their formative experiences in Israel. Not surprisingly, despite the extreme polarity of their origins, their vocations bonded them into a singular simile for the creative flower that can grow despite, or perhaps because of, uprootedness.

The fourth artist was Penina Eliany-Shuruk. Softspoken, somewhat shy, she told us of the difficulty poets face in having their works published. The market in Israel is a small one and publishing is very expensive. In contrast with the European approach to the arts, she told us, there is very little direct, financial government support for artists in Israel. (This sounded very familiar to my Canadian ears.)

Eliany-Shuruk was born in Casablanca in 1953 and emigrated to Israel as an 8-year-old child, settling with her family in the then newly established northern development town, Kiryat Shmonah.

She holds a master's degree in Hebrew Literature from Bar-Ilan University. She brought her latest collection of poems, her third, called Love Out of Womb. The poems deal with love "in all its hues," as she described it. "The book was written under the anxiety muse of a mother whose son serves in Lebanon and under the anxiety for an older mother who lives in the Katyusha-stricken north."

It was my good fortune to sit beside the dark-eyed, compelling poet that afternoon, and she asked me to read the English translation of one her poems. The love and anxiety of which she had spoken are painfully, poignantly expressed.

"The war comes with drums/ Raging days/ Sterile melodies/ Of uprooted people/ Blind and exerting as mice/ And the notes are missing/ The caressing fingers/ Which in the meantime/ Are pressing the trigger/ Without distinction Between blood and blood/ A child or a soldier./ Everything is a whirlpool of fire/ Human's animal's dust/ And then/ Quiet. Gathering sadness/ With the palms of our hands."

Rav Abraham Isaac Kook believed that poetry was part of the deep structure of God's world, inherent in its beauty, a signature of sorts, of symmetry and song to be discovered in both the grand and delicate pleasures of creation.

The literary encounter in Jerusalem was a real treat. Recalling those special authors in this column will serve, I hope, as an introduction to the many authors whose self-expressions we publish in the Fourth Annual Literary Supplement of The CJN next week.

No Jews left in North Syria

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time in thousands of years, there are no Jews left in northern Syria.

The last Jewish family in the town of Qamishli has departed, with help from Judy Feld Carr, who has aided in spirting about 3,000 Jews out of Syria since 1973.

An older man, his daughter and her four children left the northern town of Qamishli recently. The man went to New York and the woman and her children to Turkey, at least for the time being, Feld Carr told The CJN. The woman's husband has stayed behind, but has plans to join her soon.

The last Jews left the northern city of Aleppo years ago. And there are fewer than 60 mostly elderly Jews remaining in the capital, Damascus, Feld Carr said.

"It's really the first time since the days of King David that there are no more Jews in the north of Syria," she said. "It's kind of bittersweet."

It's a far cry from the days when all three cities had substantial Jewish populations, synagogues and schools. Feld Carr believes that all buildings and facilities once owned by the northern community will be seized by the Syrian government.

Judy Feld Carr aids family

For this latest effort, Feld Carr had to reactivate the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands for the first time in years. The fund, established in her late husband's name at Beth Tzedec Synagogue in 1973, has been collecting money for use mainly as bribes to Syrian officials. The money would often go to purchase passports and exit visas.

In the case of the Qamishli family, Syrian officials denied passports for the woman's two youngest children, aged six and four. The two other children, aged 12 and nine, were permitted to travel on the mother's passport.

The denial of documents was purely a capricious move on the part of Syrian authorities, Feld Carr said. She said a "substantial" amount of money had to be raised in Toronto in a short time to secure the necessary papers for the children.

Feld Carr's world-renowned campaign to rescue the Jews of Syria began in 1971, when she read that 12 Jewish boys trying to escape the country were killed by land-mines. The boys were from Qamishli.

When the State of Israel was established, the grand synagogue of Aleppo was destroyed. Following the 1967 Six Day War, 57 Qamishli Jews were murdered in a pogrom. Then, and in the 1973 Yom Kippur War, the doorposts of Jewish homes were marked and fear kept their occupants indoors.

The modern Syrian Jewish exodus began in 1992. Two years later, the country's chief rabbi, Avraham Hamra, arrived in Israel.

Among the 60 individuals left in Damascus are "one or two" young families," Feld Carr said, adding their plans aren't known.

With the end of Jewish life in the country's north, "it's sort of the end of an era for our people."

Community plans third 'campus' in York Region

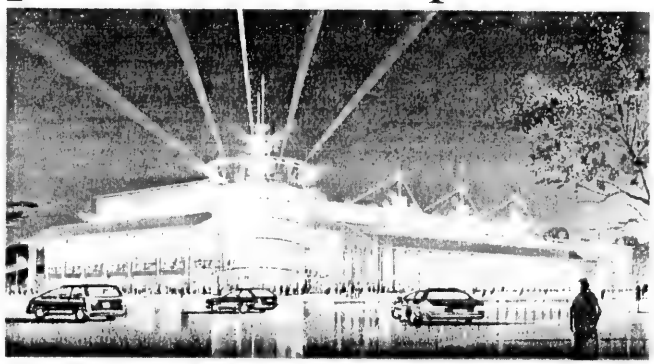
The 48-year-old Bloor JCC will be renovated to better serve Toronto's downtown Jewish population of 16,000. It currently houses two schools, among other services.

The JTT downtown plan also encompasses the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, to be built at the corner of Harbord and Huron streets for Jewish students at the University of Toronto.

Toronto, with a Jewish population of over 180,000, is among the 10 largest Jewish communities in the Diaspora, but much of the infrastructure was built to meet the needs of a Jewish population less than half that size, Alan Sandler, UJA FEDERATION president, told The CJN.

Although other North American communities including Winnipeg, San Antonio and Newark have central Jewish campuses, to the best of anyone's knowledge at UJA FEDERATION, Toronto will be the only city to have three campuses.

The York region lot is a rectangular field with two ravines which will be integrated into the design. It is about two and a half times the size of the complex housing the BJC, the Lipa Green building, and the Leah Posluns Theatre – or almost 10 times the size of an average elementary school site, according to Lou Greenbaum, chair of the planning and development committee for the York Region campus.



Artist's rendering of the new community complex in York Region.

"This is a real opportunity for the Jewish community to plan a comprehensive community campus to accommodate a lot of educational, cultural and social service needs of the growing Jewish community in York Region up the Bathurst corridor," said Greenbaum.

Plans – which include a Jewish community centre fronting on Bathurst, a second location for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, storefront-style offices for federation agencies, shared facilities including recreational space, day-care facilities for children and seniors, assisted housing and medical clinics – are subject to zoning approval.

The lot extends about halfway from Bathurst to Dufferin Street. It was purchased in February for over $6 million, to be paid for by private contributions. A residential community, still in the planning stages, is expected to surround the campus, said Leo Goldhar, chair of the York Region Jewish Campus Development Project.

UJA FEDERATION, which has been fielding dozens of calls from potential partners, will administer and guide other participants in the project, Goldhar said. "It is more than likely that we will not be able to accommodate everyone, but we will deal with the ones that are most important to the community at large."

The approval process, which must be completed before construction begins, is expected to take 18 months to two years, Goldhar said. It is hoped construction will be completed by 2010.

The site is "absolutely fabulous from an urban planning point of view," said Guela Solow-Ruda, the project's architect. Its appeal includes a presence on Bathurst Street as well as a "huge" frontage on Weldrick Avenue, which will be extended westward from Bathurst, she said.

"The overall concept is really unique and almost revolutionary," said Solow-Ruda. "We studied the best examples of urban design and came up with a plan based on public spaces."

The plan, which include indoor and outdoor public spaces, is based in part on the Piazza San Marco and indoor galleries in Italy.

Current plans link children's day care and adult day care, all focused around a big green garden, said Solow-Ruda.

"This says a lot about what we think of our Jewish community," she noted. "Community life is paramount. It says everyone is taken care of, old, young, healthy, not healthy…it also says elements like learning are central."

Cuba to help CJC bring in food for Pesach

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time, Cuba is playing a direct role in Canadian Jewish Congress's annual shipment of Passover goods to Cuban Jewry.

With help from Cuba's consul general in Montreal, Pedro Garcia Roque, the country's national airline, Cubana, has agreed to ship 4,000 kilograms of kosher supplies free of charge.

The remaining 6,000 kilograms of kosher-for-Passover foodstuffs, including wine, matzah, fish and cooking oil, are being sent by the airline at a greatly reduced rate.

Congress has been shipping Passover supplies to Cuba's Jews since 1961. But this is the first time the Cuban government has co-operated so openly and generously.

In previous years, about 40 percent of the shipment was sent by Cubana, at regular air freight rates. The rest was sent by ship.

In a statement, CJC president Moshe Ronen said Congress was "honoured" by the airline's decision to waive its fees.

Congress also praised the efforts of Walter Arbib, CEO of Toronto-based Skylink Canada, which leases aircraft. Arbib, a well-connected businessman, was in Cuba recently and inquired about the needs of the 200-family Jewish community.

Arbib told The CJN that among their concerns was the internal delivery of kosher products to Jews outside Havana. Arbib agreed to underwrite the costs of sending these Jews foodstuffs via airplane instead of overland.

He too praised the Cuban government, and said its co-operation has "opened a new chapter with Cuba."

The goods left Montreal March 31 and arrived the same day – the first time a Passover shipment to Cuba has arrived this far ahead of the holiday.

Rabbis split over resolution in Toronto, said the Reconstructionist movement has supported such unions since 1993, and he welcomes CCAR's decision.

The Conservative and Orthodox movements, however, do not accept the resolution. "It is an unfortunate decision," said Rabbi Martin Berman, of Shaar Shalom Synagogue and president of the Rabbinic Assembly, Ontario region.

"Religious ceremonies should be limited to marriages between men and women. I recognize the cries of people who want to create ceremonies for those who are not going to live in a traditional marriage, but we cannot give any religious sanctity to such relationships," he said.

Rabbi Dovid Schochet, president of Vaad Harabanim, the association of Orthodox rabbis of Southern Ontario, said that to sanctify same-sex relationships is outrageous. "It is a fantasy, and to legalize such a union is foolishness."

Rabbi Golomb does not believe the issue will carry much weight in Israel. "It will not alienate the Reform movement. The most contentious issue for them is patrilineal descent – no other issue rises to that. This resolution has more background in individual attitudes to sex, rather than in upholding Jewish law."

MS WALK set for April 16

RICHMOND HILL, Ont. — The Super Cities WALK for MS is a great way to enjoy the sights and sounds of spring in Richmond Hill, as well as support an important cause.

Step into spring by registering for the 2000 Richmond Hill-Thornhill Super Cities WALK for MS.

On Sunday April 16, Richmond Hill and Thornhill join 47 other cities across Ontario in the fight against multiple sclerosis.

This year marks the eighth annual Super Cities WALK to be held in Richmond Hill. As of April 3, 425 walkers have registered and are gathering pledges. Many more walkers are expected to register before walk day. The goal is to raise $50,000.

Set yourself a goal and get started by calling 416-967-7050 today, or register online at www.supercitieswalk.com.

Walkers start and finish their journey at Richvale Community Centre at 150 Avenue Road. The five-kilometre route goes along Richmond Hill's lovely residential streets and is completely wheelchair accessible, while the 10-kilometre route goes through parks and residential areas.

Participants will also be treated to breakfast and lunch, courtesy of Loblaws, as well as entertainment for the whole family. Richmond Hill Mayor William Bell will be honourary chair of the 2000 WALK.

The Super Cities WALKs are national in scope. More than 64,000 participants in 120 communities across Canada are expected this year. Organizers in Ontario hope to have 35,000 participants in 48 communities with the goal of raising $3.5 million. The money will support services for people with MS and fund MS research.

Since its founding in 1948, the MS Society of Canada continues to be a leader in funding MS research and providing services to people with MS throughout Canada.

MS is a disease that randomly attacks the central nervous system, affecting the control people have over their bodies. The York South Chapter of the MS Society serves people in Richmond Hill, Thornhill, Aurora, and Woodbridge-Vaughan.

'New 'chapter', same old story

Widely rumoured to be falling out of favour among the staunchest separatists in the Parti Québécois (PQ), Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard appeared to take his campaign for their continued support to the media scrums and the government drawing rooms of France last week.

That is the only explanation one can muster for the inexplicably unstatesmanlike and inappropriate behaviour displayed by the premier in dragging his French hosts into the ordure of the Canadian constitutional debate during a series of meetings with government officials in Paris and Lyon.

"[The federal government's Clarity] Bill is a violation of the right of the people of Quebec to self-determination," the premier railed. The bill "is null and void," he scoffed disdainfully.

Except his hosts know otherwise. They know the truth is exactly the opposite of what their guest from Quebec City said. They know that the federal government of Canada has taken the supremely civilized step, perhaps historically unprecedented anywhere in the democratic world, of prescribing the legal – and therefore the truly democratic – process by which the country can be dismantled to accommodate the true wishes of a true majority of Quebecers. Probably resenting the Quebec premier's publicly petulant pique, French President Jacques Chirac refused to endorse the premier's peroration. But the response from the French government seemed neither to bother nor even to surprise Bouchard. He undoubtedly knew ahead of time that Chirac would remain above the Canadian fray, as it were. The conclusion is inescapable, therefore, that the real audience for the premier's tirade was the delegates slated to attend his party's policy conference next month.

Lending further credibility to this view of events was its domestic context. On the eve of the premier's departure for France, his government withdrew its much vaunted response to the federal Clarity Bill, Bill 99, from the Order Paper because it had failed to rally public support for the PQ strategy, presumably because it was seen by the people of Quebec for what it was – a highly problematic, falsely premised, partisan ploy. Bouchard's Paris posturing was likely intended to "counterbalance" the effect on PQ stalwarts of the withdrawal of Bill 99. Quebec Intergovernmental Minister Joseph Facal said he wants to change the bill to make it palatable to the Liberal Opposition of Jean Charest. We are confident the Liberal leader will not to fall into the PQ trap.

Bouchard told his French hosts he was opening a "new chapter" in his drive towards sovereignty. The chapter may indeed be new, but it is the same old story.

CAPTIVE IN IRAN

The government of Iran still holds the following members of the Jewish community as prisoners. Each is a universe of life and existence unto his own. And each has a name. Let us not forget them.

Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Faramarz Kashi, Farzad Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Dani Teffilin, Ashessr Zadmehr.

Offers to observe Iranian trials

There were great expectations of reform and a movement to a democratic and more open society following the recent general elections in Iran.

The decision by the judge who denied 10 of the 13 Iranian Jews being detained the right to choose their own counsel is a denial of a very fundamental principle of criminal justice. That lawyers of their own choosing are not even allowed to visit their clients in prison is living proof that an enlightened judicial system in Iran is nowhere on the horizon.

When the 13 Iranian Jews were arrested, I wrote to Iran's ambassador to Canada on June 10, volunteering to be an observer at the trial. After a number of follow up letters, I did indeed receive a response from the embassy on Oct. 7, 1999, to the effect that no decision had been made regarding the participation of foreigners as observers at the trial.

When it was announced on Jan. 13 that there would be an open and public trial, and when subsequently a trial date was set for April 13, I again wrote to the ambassador on March 3 requesting permission to attend. On the same date, I wrote to the Canadian minister of foreign affairs asking that he assist me in obtaining status. I have heard from neither.

I urge the minister of foreign affairs to instruct Canada's ambassador to the United Nations to introduce a resolution condemning the trial in advance as a denial of natural justice, and calling for severe sanctions against Iran as a member state of the United Nations.

Canadian Lawyers and Jurists for World Jewry

Lifestyle not only determinant

Re: "Nutrition plays big role in breast cancer prevention" (CJN, Mar. 16). While there is tantalizing data from animal experiments suggesting that diet has a role in the prevention of breast cancer, there is no such data for humans. No study to date has demonstrated that a woman can reduce her risk of breast cancer by following any particular diet. The only possible exception to this statement is that most studies have shown an increase in breast cancer risk with increased alcohol intake.

There is no doubt that a lowfat diet rich in fibre, fruits, vegetable and legumes is desirable. Such a diet reduces the risk of a number of diseases, including colon cancer. It may well be that such a diet also reduces the risk of breast cancer. The point, however, is that this remains to be determined by properly conducted studies in women. Many such studies are currently ongoing, and their results are eagerly awaited by the medical community.

Even if it turns out that a particular diet can decrease the likelihood that a woman will develop breast cancer, the risk of breast cancer for any woman on such a diet will still be substantial. I have seen too many women who fail to seek timely medical attention for a malignant breast lump, or ignore recommendations for potentially life-saving screening, because they are convinced that they lead a lifestyle that essentially prevents breast cancer.

Objects to CJN front page

How awful it was to see plastered on your front page, standing at the Kotel Hamaaravi (CJN, March 30), a scene with one who represents those forces in Jewish history that, throughout the ages, inflicted the greatest spiritual and physical damage on our people, and continue to do so. This scene is certainly not a source of joy or any other positive emotion. It is time that we Jews take pride in the scenes that truly reflect our victories over those who would destroy us.

Crossing into Jordan, carrying an "Israeli tank"

By A. J. DIAMOND

Labour disputes in Israel are not uncommon. Frequently, the country even "shuts down." In late 1997, a general strike was called by the Histadrut for a short period. In this short memoir, the author recalls the nerve-wracking impact of the strike on his own travel plans.

My Israeli colleagues' view was that the strike by the Histadrut, the umbrella union that closed the country down, was more political than economic. Labour had supported Shimon Peres and was smarting from the electoral defeat and the present policies of the government.

This left me stranded on Thursday, with ports, airports, telephone systems and municipal services shut down. There is always an air of tension in Israel, and being unable to get out left me with a sense of unease. Furthermore, I had plans for the weekend – to meet my wife in London, visit our daughter and son-in-law in Amsterdam, go to a reunion dinner of the Oxford rugby team and attend the annual Oxford Cambridge game at Twickenham.

I made reservations to fly to London from Amman on Friday morning. I then asked my client, the Foreign Office, to arrange a passage for me across the Jordan River to Amman, via the Allenby Bridge. The chief of protocol could not have been more helpful. He said he would call back in an hour and give me instructions. Good as his word, he did. (He also gave me a telephone number to memorize in case I found myself in trouble).

This meant compressing two sets of consultant meetings scheduled for the afternoon, hasty packing and hotel checkout, in order to be in time for the Foreign Ministry car pickup. It was important to get to the bridge before it closed for the night if I was to catch my flight early the next morning.

While I waited in the hotel lobby for the Foreign Ministry driver, I watched an overweight American couple, she blond, he in denim jacket, hold hands and pause for a silent grace before tucking into heaped plates of french fries, ketchup and Coke.

A trip that normally takes about an hour from Jerusalem to the Jordan River took 38 minutes – a hair-raising drive through the Judean Desert, past the Dead Sea, bypassing Jericho on new Israeli highways designed more for strategic than for traffic requirements.

Arrival at the frontier at night is a depressing affair. First, there are two fierce looking checkpoints, fortified and bristling with armour and the antennae of listening devices, to pass through. Although the guards were curious about the passenger in the Foreign Ministry car, we passed through the Israeli side effortlessly.

After the checkpoints, there are the frontier buildings – stark, utilitarian structures lit with too bright fluorescent lights.

The Allenby Bridge border crossing between Israel and Jordan as it appeared in 1993.

Two informally dressed young women were patrolling, checking behind pot plants with a flashlight. A tough but kindly walkie-talkie-toting official escorted me through passport control to the other side. A van took me to the gate of the bridge where an Israeli security agent walked my bag and me over the bridge – there is rigid control of vehicular traffic.

The bridge is a most unimpressive structure with dilapidated and dusty steel truss sides, and a very uneven, unsecured plank roadbed. It is named after General Edmund Allenby, the British general who defeated the Turks in World War I, the defeat that dismantled the last vestiges of the Ottoman Empire.

On the other side, I was turned over by the Israeli security agent to the Jordanian police and border officials. I was to have been met by another Foreign Office car, one to drive me on the second leg of my journey to Amman. Unfortunately, it had not yet appeared.

I was taken into a seedy border post where a thin unshaven official in a poorly made uniform searched my Canadian passport for a visa. I explained that I did not need a visa, that I was only spending the night in Amman before catching my flight to London. This seemed not to be understood, and he kept repeating "visa, visa." He also asked who was to pick me up. My answers were vague, as I did not want him to know the truth before my Israeli Foreign Ministry driver arrived.

I suddenly remembered the scale models of Israeli tanks I had in my bag. The model maker who makes our architectural models in Jerusalem also makes precision models for the army. These are used for strategy sessions and to train soldiers in armour recognition. The model maker had made me a present of two of them, one the latest Merkaz tank. They now mentally burned a hole in my bag – I wondered how I would explain them to the poorly dressed border official if he were to search my bag. And I remembered, with some unease, the botched assassination attempt the previous month by two Israeli agents using false Canadian passports.

My driver finally arrived, and he also spoke little English. A Jordanian translated. After several phone calls, I was cleared and we drove off. I began to relax, feeling in the clear. However, we drove into a more extensive border control, where the driver disappeared with my passport into a building not dissimilar to its Israeli counterpart on the other side of the Jordan.

As I waited in the car, I could see him going from desk to desk. He then disappeared. After what seemed an age, a tall, lean but muscular young man with close-cropped hair opened the door of the car and threw some gear into it. He abruptly asked me to sit in the rear. Only after I got out of the car did he explain that he was a security agent who would protect me on the ride from the border to Amman. I noted that he had an impressive bulge under his armpit. He explained that he did not want anything to go wrong from there to Amman.

After about an hour's drive, we arrived at the outskirts of Amman and the security agent finally seemed to relax. He said the worst was over.

I checked into the Marriott where an air of civility pervades, although it was difficult to get Middle Eastern food on a menu dominated by American taste.

Amman has a curious city structure. Most residences are in small apartment buildings, each of which seems to be built with little relationship to the street or other buildings. Every now and then, there is a collection of somewhat larger buildings with brightly lit commercial ground floors, oases of activity. Both individual buildings and commercial clusters have a curious disassociation from each other, the only connecting thread being the road.

I was among the first to arrive at the airport the next morning – I did not want to leave anything to chance and miss the flight. With a profound sense of relief, I watched the desert recede as the aircraft rose and headed northwest to Europe, with my bag and model tanks intact in the overhead bin above me.

The controversy surrounding Pope Pius XII

During a recent quick flight on Air Canada, I had occasion to get hold of the latest issue of L'Actualité. The lead article, titled A Pope and His Sin, is an interview with John Cornwell, a British historian. Cornwell recently published a much-discussed book about the wartime activities of Pope Pius XII and his attitude toward Adolf Hitler and his regime.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I was attracted to this article because I wondered how a French language magazine, published in Montreal, would treat this subject, seeing that it is read overwhelmingly by Roman Catholics.

Its reportage is clear and forthright. It consists of a series of questions posed to Cornwell and reports his answers in detail. It notes Pius XII's long-standing affinity with the German regime and, at the same time, his occasional statements about the devastating effects of racism. On the other hand, these statements never went so far as to single out the victims, nor to condemn the extermination policies with forthright language.

It is Cornwell's belief that in Pius XII's opinion, any weakening of the Fascist state was an encouragement to the Communists, and that it was the pope's primary responsibility to prevent this.

When asked whether the pope was an anti-Semite, Cornwell said this: "His silence was in part explained by his basic view of the anti-Jewish strand of his religious comprehension. In his opinion, which was prevalent in the church at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th centuries, the Jews were the authors of their own misfortune. His was a secret antipathy toward them, which was partially religious and partially racist."

In a letter to Cardinal Pierto Gasperri, the pope said that the Bolsheviks were frequently Jewish and were morally repugnant.

But, asked the interviewer, did he not also save Jews? Was it not true that about 7,000 were hidden away by religious orders in Rome alone? Were there not some 150 institutions that were considered "extra-territorial," where Jews could indeed find secure refuge? Cornwell answered that this was done by ordinary Italians to whom anti-Semitism – and especially in its Nazi form – was foreign. But when it came to the pope, he did not lift a finger when the 1,060 Jews in the Rome ghetto were rounded up and deported to Auschwitz.

A final accusation by Cornwell points to the fact that even in the years after the war, the pope used his power to prevent a theological debate about the Holocaust. Here too, silence seemed to him a preferable policy.

I have no idea how this article has struck the Catholic readers of Quebec. It is possibly the first time that such views have been laid before them.

School's out for summer

I am outta here. School is over, exams are done and if my calculations are right, I never have to write a research paper on anything, ever again. But best of all, I get to go home for Passover – finally.

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

It's been three years since I last sat down for a seder hosted in my dining room surrounded by my family. Three years since I sang the Four Questions even though it's almost been a decade since my bat mitzvah.

Three years since I whined, "I never find the afikoman." (It's true, I don't.)

And I am so looking forward to it. What I'm not looking forward to is the total uncertainty that lies ahead for the summer. Perhaps Moses had the same feeling. Maybe when he opened up the Red Sea and walked across he stopped, took a look around and said, "OK, now what?"

I vowed I wouldn't return to my camp job. Camp was fun. Camp was good to me, but after five years of donning my staff T-shirt I think I should try something new.

It's the something new that's really terrifying because I start to wonder, "Well, what else can I do but hang out with 10-year-olds all day?" The panic sets in and I suddenly realize why self-help books are published.

I am a valuable person and somebody somewhere will want to hire me.

But right now it doesn't matter because I'm going home for Passover. Going home to my cat who sniffs around for chicken and fish during the meal and may or may not try to bolt when we open the door for Eliyahu.

Our old cat used to make his entrance at that point and we were sure Smokey the cat was really Eliyahu the Prophet.

It doesn't matter that I now only have one year left of school to last me for the rest of my life. It isn't really school because fourth year is all journalism, all the time.

None of it really matters when I'm sitting on the high-back pinkish chairs of our dining-room set as we make a valiant attempt to sing Dayenu and then give up and read it like we always do.

The concerns melt away save for the cries of, "When are you going to start?" – not even worrying about the Toronto Maple Leafs making it through the first round of playoffs or wondering who exactly is playing for the Toronto Blue Jays this season.

Alright, maybe I'm a little giddy because I'm sitting at my desk trying desperately not to do the multitude of things I should really be doing.

So I think about home and what good gefilte fish tastes like (unlike the stuff I've been forced to buy at the grocery store).

And be thankful I've made it this far in academia and in life.

And for the families who took me into their homes to celebrate the holidays while I was missing mine. And for the students who last year sat in a room of my Anglican university and sang Who Knows One? (in Hebrew) at the top of their lungs.

We might have been strangers in a strange land for 400 years but I was not lost in the land of Halifax. Just homesick, and annoyed the only thing I knew how to make was matzah smothered in cream cheese.

None of that matters now. Not one little bit. I am going home and it's Passover.

Rallying for Iranian prisoners

Mid-afternoon on March 29, I found myself standing across from 245 Metcalfe St. in Ottawa, staring up and chanting at a building guarded by a fence and video cameras and garnished with a flapping red, white and green flag. Shielding me from the droplets of rain and the bitter wind were not only the taller bodies of those standing around me, but also white posterboards bearing phrases such as "Justice Now" and "Let My People Go."

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

I was with some 35 individuals, including community leaders, rabbis and students, who seized the opportunity of being in Ottawa for a Canada-Israel Committee conference to protest the arrest of the 13 Iranian Jews by the Iranian government nearly one year ago.

They have been accused but not yet formally charged with spying for Israel and the United States, accusations both countries vehemently deny. Should they be convicted, they could face a death sentence. Many details of the case have been withheld from the public, yet the chief justice of Tehran's revolutionary courts, Gholamhossein Rahbarour, has already recorded his judgment of their guiltiness.

He has said: "It is certain that these individuals were spies. There is no doubt about this. The court has enough strong evidence and documents proving this. The Zionist regime was definitely involved in spying."

When their trial begins on April 13, can it possibly be a just one?

According to numerous sources, the trial judge has stated that proceedings will only take one day, and he has yet to decide whether international observers and the media will be privy to them. Moreover, the 13 Iranian Jews have finally been granted permission to retain defence attorneys or they will have one appointed to them. Concern has grown, however, in communities around the globe, as Iranian officials have said that the imprisoned may not be able to hire lawyers of their choice because many of the lawyers will avoid involving themselves in such a case, for fear of tarnishing their reputations.

The international community experienced a certain degree of jubilation after the recent parliamentary elections, believing that some sort of reform would come to Iran. While it is comforting to know that 70 percent of the parliamentary seats are held by moderates who promise to critically examine the political parties, the media and religious dissidents, our 13 brothers require faster relief, a more immediate salvation. Their trial is set for April 13 – clearly not enough time for these newly elected moderates to leave their mark in parliament and to effect change that has been so resisted for centuries.

In the shadow of the holiday of Purim, we remembered how in Persia (ancient Iran), two and a half thousand years ago, the Jews fasted and prayed as their fate was being determined. This year, communities around the world campaigned to ensure that the plight of the 13 individuals imprisoned in Iran remained at the forefront of people's consciousness, because their fates are as unsure as was the case in the fifth century BCE.

As we prepare for the holiday of Passover, when we will commemorate our freedom from Egyptian slavery, we must continue to remember these 13 Iranian Jews and pray for their release. I know it has become customary in my synagogue to recite a prayer for them daily, and I encourage congregations across the country to follow suit.

In addition, at the Canada-Israel Committee's Sixteenth Annual Parliamentary Dinner I attended in Ottawa, petitions were circulated and they accumulated between 600 and 800 signatures. We should be inundating our politicians' mailboxes with petitions, forcing our government to demand the immediate release of those 13 Jews so that they can celebrate, not only the release of our forefathers from the Egyptian houses of bondage, but their own freedom as well.

As citizens of a democratic country and followers of a religion that teaches there is no greater mitzvah than the redemption of captives, we should be doing everything in our power to see that our brethren no longer suffer the way our forefathers did in Egypt. We should be protesting outside embassies and consulates, raising public awareness and imposing conditions upon the Iranian government. In other words, we should be demanding their unconditional and immediate release so that on April 19, when we are in the comfort of our homes, surrounded by family and reciting Ma Nishtanah, we can all feel confident that we helped to make that night different from all others.

I would like to take this opportunity to wish all my readers a chag hacherut samayach.

The Kirshner File

Israel may not reach an agreement with Syria

When Israel launched bilateral peace talks with Syria in 1992, I went out on a limb and predicted that they would be more problematic than Israel's concurrent negotiations with the Palestinians. Regrettably, I have not been proven wrong. The fruitless meeting between Bill Clinton and Hafez al-Assad on March 26 in Geneva, widely characterized as a last-ditch attempt to revive the faltering Syrian track, is symptomatic of the excruciating difficulties the negotiations have encountered so far. Israel and Syria will probably fall short of reaching an agreement in the foreseeable future, notwithstanding Prime Minister Ehud Barak's pro forma assertion last week that the door remains open for further discussions.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel and Syria have been negotiating, on and off, for the past eight years. Although some of the gaps have been narrowed, the two sides are still far apart on critical issues: the extent of an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights, water rights, security arrangements and normalization. It took Israel and Egypt almost two years to wrap up a peace treaty. Israel and Jordan required even less time to sign a similar accord. Yet Israel and Syria, in spite of prodding and encouragement from the United States, Egypt, Jordan and the European Union, seem downright incapable of breaking their fiendish impasse.

Israel's testy talks with Syria, which have consumed the energies of no less than five Israeli prime ministers, have never gone smoothly. The first phase broke the ice, but yielded little of substance. Yitzhak Shamir opposed the cardinal land-for-peace formula, which has been at the core of Arab-Israeli negotiations since the Menachem Begin-Anwar Sadat era. The second and third phases, presided over by Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres, were productive. The Syrians themselves acknowledge that 80 percent of the work necessary for a peace treaty already has been done. But this period was not without rancor. Syria claims that it received a "deposit" from Rabin, confirmed by Peres, promising a withdrawal to the June 4, 1967 lines. Israel counters that it was a purely hypothetical pledge premised on the assumption that the depth of a pullout would be directly proportional to the depth of normalization. Martin Indyk, the current U.S. ambassador in Tel Aviv, backs Israel's claim on this pivotal issue.

Peres suspended the talks in 1996, following Assad's refusal to condemn a series of suicide bombings in Israeli cities carried out by Palestinian Islamic groups whose leaders live in Damascus.

His hawkish successor, Benjamin Netanyahu, said repeatedly that Israel could not afford to evacuate the strategic Golan. He rejected a Syrian ultimatum that a renewal of talks was only possible if Israel agreed to resume negotiations at the point they broke off. Everyone understood what Syria meant: no further talks unless Netanyahu embraced Rabin's alleged promise.

In public, Netanyahu poured scorn on Syria's condition, reiterating his position that talks should proceed without pre-conditions. But through a back channel, he authorized a hand-picked emissary, American Jewish community leader Ronald Lauder, to conduct secret meetings with Assad in Damascus. Netanyahu apparently agreed to yield the Golan in return for a peace treaty and a number of Syrian concessions. Since the details of these discussions have never been published, the reasons for Lauder's failure are still murky.

After Barak's election as prime minister last July, Assad responded positively to his implicit suggestion that he would honour Rabin's deposit. As a result, there was an exchange of mutual compliments. But the atmosphere soon soured as Syria accused Israel of equivocating.

The sudden resumption of talks last December in Shepherdstown, W. Va., surprised most observers. The breakthrough was a function of several converging factors. Assad feared that a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, an option bruited about by Barak, would rob Syria of its leverage over Israel in its armed confrontation with Hezbollah. Assad wanted to wipe the Golan slate clean before his son and heir-apparent, Bashar, succeeded him. He sought better relations with the United States so as to overhaul his ailing Soviet-style economy.

Asked whether he had assured Assad of Israel's willingness to cede the Golan, Barak was vague, saying he had made no prior commitment to Syria. "On the other hand," he added, referring to Rabin's deposit, "we are not erasing the past."

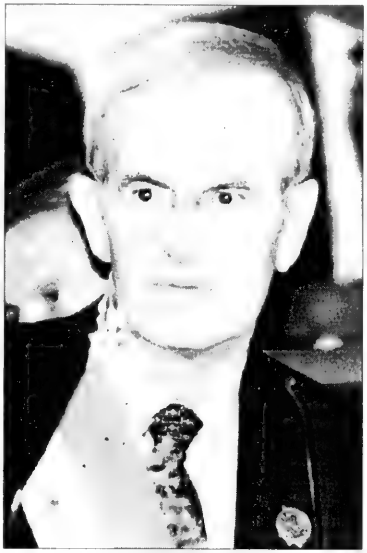
Barak and his Syrian interlocutor, Foreign Minister Farouk-al Sharaa, struck an optimistic note as the momentous Shepherdstown talks began, both saying that peace was attainable within a matter of months. Reiterating Assad's view that a peaceful resolution of Syria's conflict with Israel was a "strategic option," Sharaa glowingly described the venue as the "threshold of a historic opportunity."

In fact, despite Clinton's best efforts, Shepherdstown was a great disappointment. Barak was quickly disillusioned by Sharaa's refusal to conform to the most basic of diplomatic niceties: shaking hands with an adversary. In order to win a referendum on a Golan withdrawal, and to appease right-wing allies in his coalition government, Barak needed, and still needs, tangible demonstrations of Syrian goodwill toward Israel. Syria was not willing to play a game Sadat had played. From Syria's vantage point, public diplomacy was irrelevant in the absence of an explicit Israeli assurance to withdraw to the June 4 lines. It was therefore not surprising that the June 4 border was Clinton's undoing in his inconclusive tête-à-tête with Assad in Switzerland.

The meeting ended abruptly when Clinton informed Assad that Barak would not retreat to the June 4 lines, which encompass the northeastern corner of the Sea of Galilee, the source of 40 percent of Israel's freshwater. The Kinneret lies west of the 1923 international border, which had kept Syria 10 metres away from its northeastern banks. During the 1948 war, Syrian forces gained what was to be a 19-year foothold on a body of water which rightfully belongs to Israel.

In its denunciations of Israel, Syria rails against the inadmissability of acquiring territory by force. Yet if Israel retreats to the 1923 frontier, why should Syria be permitted to retain land it grabbed west of that line? Syria maintains that the 1923 border was illegally demarcated by two colonial powers, Britain and France, and is thus invalid.

Barak is reportedly ready to give Assad the Hamat Gader hot springs, wrested from Israel by Syria in 1951, in compensation for access to the Sea of Galilee. But Syria is not interested in that kind of a swap, nor in any arrangement which would enable Israel to widen the 10 metre strip. Assad, who was defence minister during the 1967 Six Day War, wants to reclaim the Golan down to the very last inch. He says he cannot accept anything less than Egypt.



Hafez al-Assad

In 1979, Israel and Egypt finally signed a peace agreement when Begin reluctantly consented to give up 100 percent of the Sinai, including all the northern settlements. In 1989, Israel handed over Taba, the last disputed parcel of land claimed by Egypt. The crucial question now facing Barak echoes back to the past: Is he willing, for the sake of a peace treaty with Syria, to accede to Assad's unyielding territorial demands on the Golan?

I do not think he will capitulate.

Celebrating the Get legislation

PART TWO OF THREE

Last week, we examined in general terms the impact of Get legislation since its first passage in Ontario some 14 years ago. I conducted an exhaustive review of Get-related cases during this period, and could not find a single Court decision where the Get laws were not applied. In every case where the issue arose, the Court invoked sanctions against the fellow (or sometimes, the lady) who tried to blackmail the other spouse by holding back on the Get or by simply being vindictive.

In certain situations, however, the Get laws cannot be applied easily. If the spouse "holding back" claims to have no money and asks nothing from the Court, it is difficult for the Court to indirectly encourage him to do what is right. In such situations, one successful technique is to obtain from a sympathetic Judge — with the approval of the Jewish Court — a higher order of child or spousal support than the fellow can supposedly afford. When he doesn't pay, the Government can then enforce the support order by suspending his passport, revoking his driver's license or even having a Judge throw him in jail.

Justice or coercion? Now, you may ask: Isn't all this coercive? Do not these methods offend the rule that the Get must be given of one's own free will? And if one gives a Get under such "duress", is the Jewish divorce really valid?

There is no universal agreement on this point in Jewish law. But certain leading Rabbinical authorities feel that if the amount ordered by the secular Court is approved by the Jewish Court, and the woman is given permission by the Rabbis to apply for such a remedy, then she is not technically having the husband "punished or fined" for not granting the Get. Rather, she is entitled to child or spousal support (mezeunos) irrespective of her claim for the Get.

If the husband is then "punished" by the civil courts for non-payment, it is because he didn't pay what Jewish law demands of him for his family, not because he failed to grant the Get.

Recent decisions. There are, in fact, recent Canadian Court decisions that apply similar principles. For example, in one 1997 case, an Ontario Court adopted a 1969 English Court of Appeal decision called Brett. Like the British Courts, the Ontario Court ordered spousal support in two stages on a monthly basis. A higher monthly amount was ordered prior to the Get being granted, and a lower amount once the Get was given. The Court's reasoning was simple: if the husband was preventing his wife from remarrying and enjoying the financial benefits of remarriage, then he would have to bear the costs of her supporting herself to a greater extent until he released the wife from the bonds of religious marriage.

Sometimes, despite all the creative techniques of securing a Get, certain Jewish men who are particularly knowledgeable about Jewish law simply "dig in their heels" and refuse to give the Get, irrespective of the consequences. They argue that the Get law has its limits of acceptability under Jewish law, and they will not hesitate to use this knowledge in a Jewish Court. They willingly go to the Jewish Court, and on the day of the Get ceremony claim that the use of the Get legislation is coercive.

The answer? Speak to a Rabbi qualified to supervise the granting of a Get. I often use the Get law or the Brett decision in such cases, with Rabbinical approval. Frequently, once a reluctant individual attends a Jewish court, the matter is resolved through the persuasive techniques of the Rabbis. Prior to the legislation being enacted, many such men had no reason to appear before a Jewish Court, unless they felt compelled to do so for religious reasons.

Coalition crisis looming

By AVI BENLOLO

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak may be forced to call for early elections if the conflict between his two largest coalition partners is not resolved.

The Shas and Meretz parties have been battling over the funding of the Sephardi Shas party's educational system since elections last May.

Through A Sephardi Window

But the conflict between these two parties has recently escalated, seriously jeopardizing this government. As education minister, Meretz leader Yossi Sarid has threatened to revoke funding to El Hamayan (To The Source), the national Sephardi educational institution that caters mainly to disadvantaged families in developing towns. Sarid has called for state control of this institution, citing mismanagement of funds under Shas leadership.

Shas has maintained, however, that funding must continue as it tries to restructure its organization. Now the third largest party with 17 seats in the Knesset, Shas began as a grassroots movement catering to the needs of lower income Sephardi families. Its objective has been to better the standard of living of these Sephardim through educational programs, and to increase their prominence in Israeli society.

The debacle between Shas and Meretz not only threatens to bring the government to its knees, but widens the divide between Jews over cultural and religious issues. Sarid refuses to budge, claiming that it is unconscionable for Shas to control the state's purse.

While Sarid's rationale is logical from a western perspective, it seems incomprehensible to a cultural group that believes it has been historically deprived of opportunity. Evidently, Shas is prepared to hold on to the reins of its cultural destiny at any cost.

Recent statements made by Shas spiritual leader, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, indicate the desperate situation the party is in and the extent to which it is willing to go to pacify Sarid.

In an unprecedented speech on Purim, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef contrasted Sarid with Haman. This has produced a flurry of activity in Israeli political circles, including the possibility of criminal proceedings regarding the rabbi's remarks.

The next few weeks will be critical, as Barak tries to mediate between the two parties to save his government. But while the political game is played out to feed starving egos and personal interests, the Jewish psyche is tarnished by the inability of leaders to compromise for a unified state and people.

Photos capture 'way we were'

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

A photograph, the old saying goes, is worth a thousand words.

Sometimes, however, a photograph's worth cannot be measured in words. By capturing an ephemeral moment in exquisite detail, a photograph can be far more articulate than language. Irreplaceable images of our culture from days past can be infinitely instructive as to how we lived.

Roots & Remembrance

Over the years, numerous beguiling publications have caught the fancy of Jewish genealogists and others interested in what the songsmith has romantically dubbed The Way We Were.

Take, for instance, Image Before My Eyes: A Photographic History of Jewish Life in Poland, 1864-1939, edited by Lucjan Dobroszycki and Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett. This classic photo collection made such an impression following its publication by Schocken in 1977 that it was later the basis of an equally poignant video documentary.

The photos focus on our ancestors and cousins going about their lives – learning, cooking, bartering, discussing, praying – in the stalls, markets, squares, homes and synagogues of the proverbial shtetl. More typically, however, we accept the pictures as a generic description of how our great-grandparents lived before the Shoah.

In these photographs we see and learn things we could never gather from genealogical documents. A civil record has never yet revealed the clothing styles of the celebrants, the architectural styles of synagogues and homes, the merchandise of the village marketplace, or shown the tailors, tanners and tinsmiths at work.

The material for Image Before My Eyes came from New York's YIVO Institute, which also supplied the material for the notable 1988 collection, A Century of Ambivalence: The Jews of Russia and the Soviet Union, 1881 to the Present, edited by Zvi Y. Gitelman. Well recommended, the book highlights some 350 black-and-white photographs from YIVO.

Two more highly worthy collections of photographs have recently been published. The first – Poyln: Jewish Life in the Old Country – features the photographs of Alter Kacyzne. Although not well known today, Kacyzne (1885 to 1941) was a popular Yiddish poet, dramatist and journalist who cut a major figure in Warsaw's prewar literary scene.

In 1921, the Forverts, the high-circulation American Yiddish newspaper, commissioned him to document images of Jewish life in Poland for the benefit of its largely immigrant readership. The Forverts published Kacyzne's photographs regularly for a decade.

Kacyzne's photographic eye is no less evocative, nostalgic and unveeringly ethnographic than that of another great photographer – Roman Vishniac – to whom he is sometimes compared. Like Vishniac, Kacyzne's pictures reflect the warmth and spirit of a community on the verge of destruction.

Kacyzne was killed in Tarnopol in 1941 and his photographic archives were destroyed. But the material he had sent to the Forverts survives within the YIVO Institute. Poyln, an elegant hardcover presentation of hundreds of Kacyzne's photos, is published by YIVO in conjunction with the New York publishing house, Henry Holt and Company.

Yiddishland, compiled by Gerard Silvain and Henri Minczeles (published in French by Hazan, Paris) goes even further in its photographic remembrance of the vanished world: its pages also include evocative postcards, illustrations and cartoons. At nearly 600 pages, this small-format soft-cover collection excels at capturing the ineffable, mystical aura – dare one say it? – of the Jewish soul. The book is a deep, heart-rendered sigh for a place and time that are no more.

Passover sites for kids

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Why is it only on Passover night we never know how to do anything right?

We don't eat our meals in the regular ways, the ways that we do on all other days.

'Cause on all other nights we may eat all kinds of wonderful good bready treats, like big purple pizza that tastes like a pickle, crumbly crackers and pink pumpernickel.

Yes – on all other nights we eat all kinds of bread, but tonight of all nights we munch matzah instead.

Doesn't sound quite like your standard seder? That's an excerpt from Eliezer Siegel's Uncle Eli's Special-for-Kids Most Fun Ever Under-the-Table Passover Haggadah. [http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Uncle_Eli/Eli.html] Written in the style of Dr. Seuss, Uncle Eli retells the Haggadah in a familiar yet unique way. And it's one of the many fun and free Passover children's sites on the Jewish Highway.

Today, my favourite kosher for Passover Internet treats for kids: stories, quizzes, recipes, music, colouring pages and poems.

A great place to start is at Virtual Jerusalem's Pesach Parade [http://www.vjholidays.com/pessach/parade.htm]. It has a children's Haggadah, some holiday recipes geared toward kids and an animated video about Passover [http://www.vjholidays.com/pessach/jtn.htm]. You will need to register for a free password in order to gain access to some of the Virtual Jerusalem pages.

When you are done there, click over to Passover.net for traditions and stories, a hunt for the afikoman puzzle – and a glimpse at what things looks like after you've downed four cups of wine (hint: very blurry) [http://www.Passover.net].

Last week, we looked at food for the holiday. If you need help with the cooking, put your kids to work. At Kids Kook for Pesach [http://www.vjholidays.com/pesach/food.htm] there are easy recipes for Charoset (The Mortar You Love to Eat!), Cheese Blintzes and Matza Pizza Treatsa.

When you're finished with that, try the Matza Ball Game Quiz [http://www.his.com/~chabad/passover/] and the Passover Virtual Quiz Mania [http://join.virtual.co.il/show/]. These questions are both funny and interesting, and the music and sound effects will give you a good laugh.

Here's an example: "What did the Egyptians say when they were no longer able to copy the plagues? (a) This is the finger of God; (b) The new technology is amazing; (c) It is that fellow Moses again!; or [the correct answer] (d) Nothing – the Egyptians might have been dumb, but they weren't stupid. They were duly impressed."

Budding young artists may want to check out a couple of Passover colouring books they can print and then decorate. The Diaspora Yeshiva pages focus on the steps of the seder [http://www.mznet.org/holidays/seder/seder.htm] while Torah Tots also has pages illustrating the story of Pesach and the Ten Plagues [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/pesach/pescolor.htm].

Is it time to refresh the music around your seder table? If you're looking for Haggadah melodies, check out [http://www.613.org/passover.html] and listen to selections of the Haggadah online. One link will take you to Let's Sing The Seder in which Mr. Matzah and Mrs. Maror take you on a 45-minute musical tour of the seder.

When you're done, Fran Manushkin will read her delightful story, The Matzah That Papa Brought Home. Fran says she wrote it because she didn't understand how the seder worked when she was growing up. The story is recited in the accumulative style of Chad Gadya.

Here's an excerpt: "This is the matzah ball soup that we sip/ After the bitter herbs that we dipped/ After Dayenu, a very long song/ That we sang with our stomachs growling along/ After we counted the Plagues all ten/ By dipping our pinkies again and again/ After I stood up tall and proud/ And asked the Four Questions nice and loud/ During the Passover seder we shared/ To eat the feast that mama made/ With the matzah that Papa brought home."

Have a kosher and very happy Passover.

An inspiring leader

Fire In The Night, Wingate of Burma, Ethiopia and Zion*, by John Bierman & Colin Smith (Random House).

Books
Bernard Baskin

During Israel's War of Independence, Orde Wingate's young widow arranged for her husband's copy of the Bible to be dropped with a consignment of essential supplies into a children's village then under siege by Syrian troops. (A less dramatic version is that the Bible was handed over to members of the village).

In any case, the dedication, which she wrote on the flyleaf, read: "To the Defenders of Yemin Orde. Since Orde Wingate is with you in spirit, though he cannot lead you in the flesh, I send you the Bible he carried in all his campaigns and from which he drew the inspiration of his victories. May it be a covenant between you and him, in triumph or defeat, now and always."

Who was Wingate? Why is he regarded as a Jewish hero? Why does almost every town in Israel have a street or square named after him?

Born in India in 1903, raised in England by devout Christian parents, Orde chose the British Army as a career. In 1936, he was posted to Palestine, then under a British mandate. He was captivated by the land and became a passionate Zionist. Based on his experience as a soldier in the Sudan where he gained valuable desert experience, he trained some of Israel's future army chiefs, such as, Moshe Dayan and Yigal Allon in his unorthodox methods of warfare.

He organized and trained the first Jewish commando forces and maintained that his military ideas where inspired by such biblical figures as Joshua, Gideon and David.

Some of his conservative colleagues, enamoured of the romantic Arab way of life, found him scruffy, arrogant, insubordinate and a fanatical Zionist. Snubbed and shunned by his fellow officers, Wingate remained undeterred. In 1937, fearing that a world war was inevitable he wrote, shortly after his arrival in Palestine, "For pity's sake, let us do something just and honourable before it comes. Let us redeem our promises to Jewry and shame the devil of Nazism, Fascism and our own prejudices."

After three years in Palestine, Wingate led another guerrilla-style force, this time into Italian-occupied Ethiopia. He was instrumental in restoring Haile Selassie to his throne. His final accomplishment was the formation of the Chandits, the army that penetrated behind Japanese lines in Burma. In 1944, he died in a plane crash on the Burmese front.

Winston Churchill spoke of him as a man of genius and audacity. However, the British military establishment, both during his lifetime and after, downplayed his achievements and pilloried him as self-seeking and unreliable – a loner whose military exploits were exaggerated.

The authors, veteran news correspondents, with first-hand knowledge of the venues that are central to the book, have written an absorbing biography of an inspiring leader that is of special interest to Jews. Every year Israel's ambassador to Washington places a wreath on Wingate's grave at Arlington Cemetery. It bears the one word in Hebrew, Hayedid – The Friend.

Can nearly 200,000 people be having the same dream?

A congregational Rabbi. A young day school student. A social worker at Reena. A client at Jewish Family & Child Service. Each of these people is having the same dream. Along with thousands of Jews all over Toronto, they are dreaming about the future of our community.

The dream is called Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT)—a response to our tremendous growth over the last 20 years—from 80,000 to nearly 200,000 Jews. Through Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, UJA FEDERATION, along with its partner schools, agencies and organizations, will be working together on 21st century solutions to meet our new needs.

JTT combines the largest development program in our community's history with a new partnership approach to philanthropy. It's going to dramatically change the way we operate by first assessing community priorities and then matching donors with ideas to organizations with dreams.

Most importantly, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow will be the springboard to provide our remarkable community with the facilities, services and programs for a new era.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow offers room for everyone to be involved, because it represents the collective dreams of a dynamic, growing community. A community creating its future together.

Sol Edell helped found Clanton Park synagogue

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sol Edell, a well- loved and highly respected member of Toronto's Jewish community died last week after a brief illness. He was 81.

Edell was born in Toronto, the grandson of Rabbi Yoseph Weinreb, the first Orthodox rabbi in the city, and the son of Pesach and Molly Edell.

Edell attended Harbord Collegiate, and graduated from the University of Toronto College of Pharmacy in 1943, after getting a special leave of absence from the army to finish university.

Returning to the army after his graduation, he worked as a lieutenant in the signal corps. The army made a special effort to provide him with kosher food, recalls his sister, Sara Schafler.

In 1948, he opened Edell's Drugs on Queen Street, the first shomer Shabbat drug store in the city. He opened subsequent drug stores on Spadina Avenue and in the Elmhurst Plaza in Rexdale.

He left pharmacy to manage the Elmhurst Plaza and to be president of Elmdale Investments.

Edell's communal activities were extensive. He founded and built the Clanton Park synagogue, and remained active there until his death.

Rabbi Yitzchak Kerzner, the shul's spiritual leader, said that Edell did everything there, from being president for seven one year terms, to making visitors feel welcome, to "the most menial jobs like changing the light bulbs."

Edell was on the board and co-chair of the properties committee of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (Pardes Shalom), president of the Jones Avenue cemetery, member of the board of Mizrachi, and was very involved with Or Chaim Yeshiva and Ulpanot Orot Girls School.

For 10 years he was chair of the archives committee of CJC Ontario Region, and was responsible for restoring the Kiever shul. He was an officer of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and on the Kashruth Council.

Edell helped build the community mikvah on Sheppard Avenue, and designed the genizah, where religious articles are buried, at Pardes Shalom.

Sister-in-law Rachel Weinstock said that he "took it as his personal mission to help the needy."

Edell was predeceased by two wives, Doreen Weinstock and Celia Hoffman, his brother David and sister Ethel.

He is survived by children Ethel and Judah Goldwasser, Simcha and Dalia, Stephen and Jodi, Malka and Joseph Rotenberg, Joseph and Esty, and Jay and Janice, as well as 26 grandchildren, and sisters Connie Reisner and Sara Schafler.

Montreal native was a leading researcher

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An internationally known researcher died suddenly, just days after learning that he had received a prestigious Senior Science Award from Canada's Medical Research Council.

Chaim Niznik, who was 43 when he suffered a fatal heart attack on March 31, specialized in the field of schizophrenia. He headed the molecular neurobiology research section at Toronto's Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, formerly the Clarke Institute, where he had been on staff since 1991.

Niznik, a native of Montreal, was the son of Zyna and Rabbi Avrum Dovid Niznik, Montreal's chief rabbi. An alumnus of Ner Israel Yeshiva in Baltimore, Niznik kept up his Jewish studies in recent years at a weekly class led by Rabbi Baruch Taub.

Niznik was particularly interested in unravelling the mysteries of schizophrenia through his research on chemical abnormalities in the brain's dopamine system, said Franco Vaccarino, the addiction centre's vice-president of research. Niznik's work also had implications for the treatment of depression, bi-polar disorder, drug addictions and Parkinson's disease, Vaccarino added.

Niznik was "an absolutely outstanding researcher" who had recently discovered a new mechanism by which brain cells communicate with each other, said Vaccarino.

"What he accomplished in a relatively short time, most scientists don't accomplish in a lifetime. His work set the stage for research in the future that will go on for years to come."

Vaccarino described Niznik as "humble, creative and intelligent, with an enormous motivating influence on his students. His death was a huge loss for us professionally and personally."

Niznik met his wife Betty at McGill University, where she was a genetics student. He was studying psychology there after transferring from Johns Hopkins University.

Niznik received his PhD in neuropharmacology from the University of Toronto in 1985. His work was the fulfilment of a long-term goal. "He always wanted to help people," said Betty.

In addition to his wife and parents, Niznik leaves two children, Aly and Yossi.

'Jewish beliefs' lead doctor, nurse to help in Guyana

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leya Aronson's family teased her about a mid-life crisis when she volunteered for Ve'ahavta's recent medical mission to Guyana. A nephew in Israel addressed a letter to "Dodah [Aunt] Tarzan."

None of this deterred the pediatric nurse who more commonly tends to patients at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Neither was her level of religious observance an obstacle. In fact, she was one of two observant Jews on the 14-person, two-week mission.

Dennis Scolnik, an emergency room physician at Sick Kids, said being observant isn't an issue if it's your lifestyle.

"It's infinitely manageable," said Aronson at a recent interview around her dining room table.

She and Scolnik, a native of Zimbabwe who has lived here for 11 years, took a suitcase full of kosher supplies – dehydrated foods, utensils, foil to cover counters when they prepared meals, and – for Shabbat – matzah, a challah cover, candles and candlesticks, a havdalah set and wine.

Supplies brought by Ve'ahavta included toys, children's vitamins, laboratory equipment and medications including snake venom antidote. Most of the items were donated.

They brought a walker for a girl left blind and with balance difficulties after a bout of encephalitis. She had been seen on last year's mission. When she walked across the room on her own for the first time, said Scolnik, everyone was crying.

Communication was not a problem, as the South American country is a former English colony.

Although Scolnik and Aronson did not work on Shabbat, if a patient had shown up needing urgent care, there is "no question" they would have dealt with it, Aronson said.

A colleague of Aronson's was surprised to learn of her participation in the mission.

"When you have a Jewish family in the hospital, people come and bring food," said Aronson. "I think it's very important that people realize it's not just for ourselves that we do things. This is something we're doing for our Jewish beliefs."

Ve'ahavta's name refers to the mishnaic injunction to love the stranger as oneself. The Jewish humanitarian organization was founded in 1997. The recent medical mission was its third one to Guyana.

Volunteers were based in Bartica, a town of 12,500 in a country that spends only 50 cents per person per year on health care, according to Scolnik. Their daily routine included bathing in the river, after being woken by donkeys braying and roosters crowing.

Most days, they were on their way to makeshift schoolhouse medical centres by 8 a.m., via motorboat.

Before seeing patients, the volunteers would hang ropes from the walls, drape blankets as partitions, and set mattresses atop desks.

The mini-clinics were staffed by a family practitioner, a pharmacist, an internist and an infectious disease specialist, among others. They saw over 250 patients a day.

Local Lions Club volunteers co-ordinated the project in Guyana. "They fund-raised all year to pay for lodging, accommodation and boats," said Scolnik.

Among the most serious cases were a little girl with appendicitis and a young man suffering from falciparum malaria, the most deadly strain.

An intravenous antibiotic bought the child time to get to a hospital in another town. During a 2 a.m. housecall, Scolnik stood on a chair for 35 minutes to hold an IV bag, because there was nowhere to hang it in her tiny room.

The young man with malaria was successfully treated by round-the-clock nurses for 48 hours in their guesthouse.

Although Scolnik hesitated initially at the thought of providing "missionary medicine," with patients becoming ill again once the volunteers left, he was gratified by the ability to eradicate a particular disease in a community with blanket use of a one-dose medication.

And by simply giving vitamins, he could stave off blindness in a child with a Vitamin A deficiency. "That's pretty good," he said. "You have got to start somewhere."

"I would go back in a flash," said Aronson. "It was an incredibly rewarding experience."

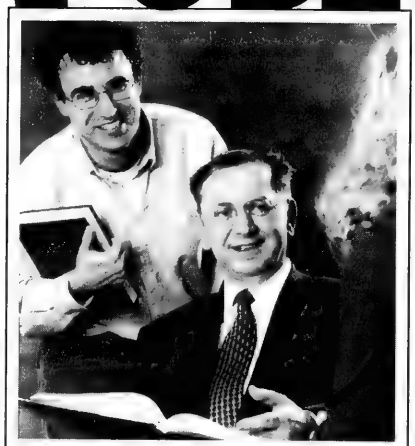
HOW TO BRIDGE THE GAPS BETWEEN JEWS



Prof. Kaveh: "Judaism and democracy are complementary."

By PROFESSOR MOSHE KAVEH
President, Bar-Ilan University
Ramat Gan, Israel

What should be done about the acrimony between religious and secular Jews in Israel? Are there concrete steps that would remove the bitter tensions between Orthodox Israelis and Conservative and Reform Jews in North America? This divisiveness is like the weather; everyone talks about it but few try to do anything about it.

In Israel, observant and non-observant Jews sometimes seem like two trains rushing headlong towards each other on a collision course. The Israeli media trumpet the advent of a seemingly inevitable "culture war" between Israeli Jews who embrace religion and those who don't. Israeli Orthodox leaders and Diaspora Jews with different approaches to Judaism often seem pitted against one another in equally angry confrontations.

Yet the idea that religious and secular Jews — and those in different synagogue groups in Israel and North America — are entirely different breeds who are doomed to be in conflict is a dangerous falsehood. As a rigorously Orthodox Jew committed to the integrity of the halachic system, I am painfully aware that the gaps between us are yawning, but I am convinced they can be bridged. The rancor may be growing, but it can be replaced by respect and civility and basic decency.

A Miracle of Tolerance and Respect

I know that respect between Jews of widely different backgrounds is possible because I see it demonstrated every day at Israel's Bar-Ilan University, where I am the President. Half of our 26,000 students are religiously observant, while half are not. They study together, socialize with each other, sometimes learn from one another. In contemporary Israel, this is something close to a miracle.

"We must teach the Jewish world, like we teach our students, the importance of compromise and mutual respect"

Today, a religious Israeli youngster can go to cheder, to a religious high school and to a segregated unit in the army without having anything but superficial contact with secular kids. And young secular people are just as isolated from observant Jews. For many of them, Bar-Ilan U. is the first place they meet, the place they discover that those with different values are not evil.

At our university, secular Jews who have never opened a Torah are required to study Jewish culture and heritage. Cloistered religious Jews are exposed for the first time to core values of the Western intellectual tradition, such as a commitment to democracy and tolerance, free intellectual inquiry, etc.

When I watch the news on Israeli television and see religious and secular Jews screaming at one another like blood enemies, I learn to appreciate the tolerance on campus we have achieved.

Sad to say, the rest of Israel and the Jewish world are not bound together by such mutual respect. Contrary to popular belief, the main reason for this is not that the value systems and customs of the observant and non-observant are so markedly different. The main reason is woeful, perilous ignorance.

Neither religious Jews nor secular Jews in Israel know enough about each other and the value systems that are prevalent in different sectors of Israeli society. Similarly, Orthodox Israeli Jews have little contact with those in other Jewish denominations and insufficient appreciation of their commitment to Jewish community.

The Perils of Ignorance

The first concrete step needed to prevent a culture war is to address this ignorance, which — in Israel, at least — is borne of isolation and de facto segregation. There is a kind of negative symmetry between religious schools and secular schools in Israel. Neither wants to confront the values of the other.

Our religious schools increasingly are afraid to confront or deal with secular culture, which is perceived as inherently corrupt and opposed to a Jewish way of life. As a result, young people in those schools are sheltered and cut off from mainstream Israeli life. I often tell the heads of yeshivot that they are working against their own aims by isolating students.

Eventually, their students do move out into the secular Israeli world of work and culture. When they do, they have no immunity against it. They don't know how to respond to the creative variety of lifestyles and temptations of the "outside" world; they are not equipped to choose intelligently from the intellectual smorgasbord of this world, or to reject that which is empty of value.

Mirroring this fear of the other, most of our secular schools shelter and cut off their students from any contact with Jewish tradition and Jewish wisdom. The idea that the Torah and the Talmud have profound wisdom to offer all Jews, whether or not they believe in God, seems to have escaped many of Israel's educational leaders. Even the idea that it might help create more civility and tolerance if secular students learned a little bit about what the religious believe and think — this is also absent from much of Israel's mainstream educational system.

The Healing Power of Knowledge

One antidote to what ails Israel and the Jewish world, then, is the tonic that has sustained our people for several millennia: knowledge. This means knowledge based on personal interaction and dialogue as well as scholarship.

Israel is blessed with a small but growing number of wonderful dialogue programs. Secular and religious adults are meeting each other. They are talking, studying together, developing a respectful discourse, discovering that they have much in common. These encounters are extremely important, and Bar-Ilan University professors are actively involved in many of them. One of our programs on campus teaches both secular and religious students that democratic values and principles have their roots in the Torah, that democracy is very much a Jewish concept, that Judaism and democracy are complementary values.

"One antidote to what ails the Jewish world: knowledge."

These educational efforts, unfortunately, are few and far between. They should be expanded throughout Israel's public and religious school systems, and to the day schools and supplementary schools in North America.

The knowledge and the interactions produced by this expansion are bound to result in something else that the Jewish world desperately needs: the will to compromise, to settle for less than maximalist ambitions when it comes to questions of conversion, Shabbat observance, marriage and divorce, and other pressing matters on the public agenda.

Needed: A New Search for Shared Values

While revamping our approach to Jewish education is vital, it is not nearly enough. We may be able to introduce more knowledge and mutual respect, but doing so will just turn down the temperature a bit without dousing the fires of intolerance. Israelis — and the rest of the Jewish people — also need changes that are much bolder, much more far-reaching, if we want to address the hatred that threatens us.

Modern Jews will not unite unless there is something to unite behind. It is essential to develop a new sense of shared values and common assumptions about morality and Jewish identity.

The imperative of the hour is the development of a set of basic principles that can be adopted both by those who keep kosher and those who don't; by young secular Jews in the cafes of Tel Aviv or Toronto or Cleveland — and by their peers in yeshivot; by those who don't believe in God and don't care about organized "Judaism"; even by those so-called "post-Zionists" who care increasingly less for Jewish sovereignty and statehood.

"It is essential to develop a new sense of shared values."

I believe these shared values and assumptions can be found in halacha — Jewish law — and the Jewish tradition. For thousands of years, the common denominator of the Jewish people was the Torah, the rabbinic commentaries and Jewish observance. Even in this cynical, post-modern world, even in an age when malls and MTV are more important to most Jewish kids than Maimonides, religious and non-religious people alike can find in the Torah an endless wellspring of moral and ethical wisdom, a fountain of principles and precepts that are the antidotes to much of what ails us in the modern world.

Judaism is what must unite us — as a culture for secular Jews; as a way of life for religious Jews. We need not be on the same track religiously; but we must be headed in the same direction, towards a future in which our descendants will have enough in common and enough pride in their Jewishness so that our people remain intact.

Three Rules for Jewish Life

Israel and the Jewish world need rabbis with the courage to apply broad halachic values to the contemporary world of Jewish communal confusion; to apply halacha to domains that go beyond the classic focus on what is appropriate and what is forbidden when squeezing a lemon on Shabbat.

Observant Jews study in detail the rules of kashrut and all the other ritual rules that are central to halachic life. But it is also important to know the halachic approach when you have to breach a contract with a friend or when you are faced with a dilemma of civil or human rights. When we see homeless people on the streets of Tel Aviv or Los Angeles, what does halacha tell us to do?

This is a matter of broadening perspectives as well as liberalizing attitudes. The idea that halacha is a rigid system subject only to the strictest, most narrow interpretations of the Torah is mistaken. The rabbis of old created solutions and adapted to changing realities throughout history, within halachic boundaries. The Torah imposed economic prohibitions during the "sabbatical" or seventh year. When that became a problem, wise sages permitted land to be sold to a non-Jew. Rabbis today need some of this same broad, creative spirit.

Today, the most important task that faces us is to find a new, halachic recipe to overcome our internal hatreds and create a set of common assumptions to guide Jewish life. I believe this recipe can be found in three basic rules, three principles drawn from the world of halacha. If these principles were adopted in every Jewish neighborhood and school, in every Jewish home, we would be able to start from scratch and create a new Jewish people that shuns — rather than embraces — contention and conflict.

Klal Yisrael

The first rule of Jewish life should be the primacy of *Klal Yisrael, the community of Israel. There is nothing more important. In fact, Klal Yisrael supersedes all other values in our tradition.

It is common for Jews to ascribe the highest value to the sanctity of life. If someone sick is going to die, you must save his life even when this entails a violation of Shabbat laws. All rules of Shabbat ritual become irrelevant. The sanctity of life supersedes the Torah, we are taught.

Well, then, why is one allowed to go to war? What about the sanctity of life? My second son was wounded in battle and my wife didn't sleep at night. Why? Isn't the life of my son more important than anything in the entire Torah? In fact, Jewish wisdom and Jewish law indicate that even the sanctity of life is secondary to Klal Yisrael. In order to protect the people of Israel, to protect your loved ones and friends and neighbors and Jews you don't know, you should be willing to sacrifice your life.

If preserving the Jewish community became the highest priority for both religious and non-religious Jews, imagine the far-reaching implications.

A true commitment to Klal Yisrael means a commitment to each and every Jew. That means the so-called "ultra-Orthodox", the so-called "modern Orthodox" and the secular sectors in Israel. It means the Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, Reconstructionist in North America. It means unaffiliated Jews in every corner of the world.

Imagine what our life would be like if all Israeli rabbis related to Conservative and Reform Jews with the inclusive spirit of Klal Yisrael. With Klal Yisrael in mind, imagine how much more welcoming they would be to Orthodox women who want a bigger role in Jewish rituals. Imagine how much more receptive secular Jews would be to the teachings of their religious neighbors if they believed the Jewish religion had a more inclusive spirit that was prompted by the imperative of unity.

Imagine how much more unified we would be if more Reform and Conservative rabbis and other non-Orthodox leaders accepted the premise that we need one standard, the halachic standard, for conversions — with a unified conversion process along the lines suggested two years ago by Yaacov Neeman. A Klal Yisrael process.

Imagine the positive Jewish identity message we would be sending to our youth if secular leaders in Israel today would re-embrace David Ben-Gurion's historic, wise commitment to maintaining kosher standards in public institutions and Shabbat observance in the public domain. If Klal Yisrael were the spirit of the day, politicians who continually bash the Orthodox way of life would be shunned and marginalized. As would rabbis who use intemperate language against political rivals.

Most of all, Klal Yisrael means restraint. It means restraining our wildest ideological passions and denominational dreams when these irreconcilably conflict with those of other committed Jews. Because building and maintaining Klal Yisrael is worth more than winning most organizational battles.

Kevod Habriot

The second rule for a more unified Jewish world is kevod habriot*, which means respect for the living and sensitivity to human values.

Kevod habriot is one of the most important concepts in Jewish life. Since God created the human being in His image, you should respect your neighbor to such an extent that this respect overshadows the immediacy of many other mitzvot (Torah commandments).

Imagine the Jewish revolution that would take place if we told the younger generation that respecting others, treating others decently, is as important as hundreds of mitzvot. Imagine how that would transform our kids; how it would make our tradition more appealing to youth of all sectors; how it would make Jewish communities better places for us all to live in.

Peace and Truth

The third rule for a harmonious Jewish life: when you have a confrontation between peace and the truth, peace is more important.

The Torah tells us that God deviated from the truth when He wanted peace between Abraham and Sarah (see Rashi, Genesis 18:13). We have many more examples of this revolutionary principle in our tradition.

In today's Jewish world, this means that all sectors need to restrain from imposing their understanding of what is true on those who don't share that understanding. This means if you are a religious Jew and the halacha says you can do something, it doesn't necessarily mean you have do it, especially when your action is likely to offend or alienate another committed Jew.

In the same way, those Israelis who make a kind of religion of civil laws, who aggressively advance a strict separation between "church" and state to the point of assaulting deep-rooted religious sensibilities — must also restrain themselves. For example, the Israeli Supreme Court doesn't need to demonstratively and defiantly apply civil law to every aspect of life. Thirteen judges on the Supreme Court, no matter how distinguished, are not the people who should be ruling on "Who is a Jew," on what is an appropriate conversion to Judaism, or whether and how to enforce Shabbat law.

So these are my three basic Jewish rules of life. We need to bring them to our schools, to our children. With these rules, a new generation of Jews will learn how to respect one another and will learn the importance of community. The three rules should form the common denominator for the Jewish people.

The Jewish Molecule

I am a physicist by training and often think in terms of scientific concepts. In this vein, I say that the Jewish people would benefit from a shared commitment to creating a secular-religious "molecule" bonded together in both Israel and the Diaspora.

The Jewish molecule would be much like salt. Salt contains chloride and sodium. If you ingest chloride, it is poisonous. If you eat raw sodium in large quantities, it is equally deadly. But the combination of sodium and chloride is salt, without which we cannot eat anything.

Within Jewish tradition is the wisdom needed to bind together the secular-religious molecule. A stable combination of very different elements. A solid union that is life preserving rather than poisonous.

What the Jewish people need, in Israel and in North America and around the world, are moderate leaders with the courage to begin this binding process.

Bar-Ilan University strives to be a model for religious-secular dialogue and understanding, a place where every Jew feels at home. Every day, 26,000 Israelis of widely-varying backgrounds and religious beliefs — half observant, half not — work and study together in harmony at the university. While learning what it means to be good Jewish and Israeli citizens, our students benefit from 6,000 courses in the faculties of exact, life and social sciences, humanities, Jewish studies and law taught by 1,300 of the Jewish world's most distinguished academic faculty.

Already Israel's largest university, Bar-Ilan U. plans to double again in size over the next ten years with $500 million of new construction — laboratories, dormitories, libraries, classrooms and parklands. Former Vancouverite promotes Sephardi programs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Yosef Benarroch, who left his Vancouver pulpit last year to make aliyah, was back in Canada recently promoting two new programs of the Sephardic Educational Center (SEC) in Jerusalem.

The centre's only North American faculty member, Rabbi Benarroch is a native of Tangiers, Morocco who immigrated to Winnipeg at age five. He is an alumnus of Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate and the University of Manitoba, where he studied physical education.

Rabbi Benarroch's father, Salomon, is a shochet in Winnipeg, and his twin brother, Rabbi Yamin Benarroch, is based in Montreal at the Hebrew Academy High School.

The Israel-based Rabbi Benarroch was spiritual leader of Vancouver's Beth Hamidrash, a Sephardi congregation serving about 200 families, until he and his wife moved to Israel with their seven children last year.

He feels fortunate to have found a position at the 20-year-old SEC, located in the former residence of Sephardi chief rabbis, in a building owned by the Sephardi community for centuries.

When Rabbi Benarroch studied at yeshivot in Israel, he found a large Sephardi presence among students and faculty, but not a Sephardi program per se.

Although Israel has Sephardi yeshivot for men, there has been no equivalent for Sephardi women, he said. He is working on an intensive post-high school Sephardi Women's Midrasha (place of learning) for English speakers, to begin later this year. "It's geared to women who are serious about learning Judaism," Rabbi Benarroch said.

The curriculum includes traditional religious studies as well as Sephardi studies including Sephardi prayer, sages, liturgy and history.

The program will also have a strong leadership training component. "We want communities to know they'll get someone back who'll really be able to become a leader...what we hope to do is get [students] so excited about leadership that they'll want to be active members of our community."

The faculty for the women's program is not completely assembled. Although there are no women among the current SEC staff,

Rabbi Yosef Benarroch

Rabbi Benarroch said he would be very happy if someone could help him find qualified women teachers. An extensive search for English-speaking female Sephardi teachers in Israel yielded no qualified candidates, he said.

"You can't have a women's program without women teachers. The problem is, we don't just want someone who speaks English, but who [also] understands the culture and mentality of students coming from North America."

If necessary, there will be women guest teachers from other institutions, he indicated. The program will cost about $9,500 US including room, board, tuition and excursions.

In a three-week tour that included Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver as well as four American cities, Rabbi Benarroch was also promoting a one-year joint program of the SEC and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. The program is open to graduate and undergraduate students who will take Sephardi studies courses at both institutions. Credits will be recognized by North American universities.

Tuition will be $12,000 US, with a 50 percent subsidy available to eligible students who commit to work in their own community on their return.

Rabbi Benarroch, whose title at the centre is simply "rabbi," will teach religious studies, including Chumash, Bible studies and Jewish law with Sephardi rulings.

'British Indiana Jones' seeks lost tribes in Africa

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Wall Street Journal dubbed Tudor Parfitt "a British Indiana Jones, seeking the lost tribes of Israel."

You wouldn't know it from the mild-mannered, bespectacled British professor. But he does tell a rattling good yarn.

It begins about a decade ago, when Parfitt, a University of London anthropologist and expert on Middle Eastern history, was delivering a lecture on the Jews of Ethiopia. At the back of the room, he spied several black, kippah-wearing Jews who later identified themselves as Africans too.

Only their origins were in South Africa and Zimbabwe. As Parfitt told an audience at Beth Tzedec Synagogue last week, his initial reaction to the Africans' Jewish claims was "utter incredulity, because there is no record of Jews in sub-Saharan black Africa."

Intrigued, he took up the Africans on their offer to visit, and found that these were the Lemba, a Bantu-speaking people who number roughly 50,000 and live in northern South Africa and southern Zimbabwe. He encountered a people who eschewed eating pigs or pig-like animals, kept one day a week holy (and fasted one day a year), circumcised their boys, had a mikvah and were, as he put it, "obsessed" with ritual slaughter. One tribal elder even wore a gown adorned with a Star of David. Others had Semitic-sounding clan names, such as Sadiqui and Hamisi.

The Lemba's oral tradition had it that they were Israelites who came to Africa from the north, by way of a mysterious place called Sena. Parfitt set out to find it.

The trail, he recalled, went cold in Zanzibar. But while traveling to the site of former Jewish communities in Yemen, Parfitt chanced to mention the Lemba tradition of Sena to a local Muslim cleric, who replied that such a village exists, though it wasn't on any maps.

Parfitt found Sena, a remote village in Yemen's Hadramawt region, where he encountered names that sounded similar to those among the Lemba. Local lore had it that about 1,000 years ago, a dam burst, and the inhabitants fled.

Parfitt also found that a valley connects Sena with a coastal town called Sayhut. Trade winds could carry a ship to Africa in nine days, he discovered.

Parfitt took DNA samples from the residents of Sena and compared them with samples taken from the Lemba. He found the genetic overlap between the two disparate groups was "substantial," and constituted proof the Lemba had migrated from the Arabian peninsula. But it didn't answer the whole Jewish question.

Genetic detectives

At about the same time, an eclectic team of researchers from Israel, Britain and the United States was working to find out what proof there was that priests – kohanim – are the descendants of Aaron, Moses' elder brother, as described in the Book of Exodus.

The genetic detectives had a big advantage. In Judaism, priestly status is passed from father to son through the male or Y chromosome. Unlike the other chromosomes, the genetic material on the Y chromosome is not shuffled every generation, obscuring the lines of descent. Y chromosomes are passed from father to son virtually unaltered, apart from the occasional mutation.

After studying DNA samples taken from Israeli Jews, the researchers found that 45 percent of Ashkenazi kohanim and 56 percent of Sephardi kohanim had the telltale genetic signature, called the Cohen modal haplotype. In the general Jewish population the frequency is three to five percent.

The DNA taken earlier from the Lemba was then tested for the priestly markings. Those results showed that nine percent of Lemba men carried the kohanic genetic marker.

But the real kicker, as Parfitt noted, was when the tests showed that 53 percent of the Lemba's own priestly tribe, the Buba, carried the distinctive genetic sequences. It's a proportion that is similar to those among major Jewish populations.

While the researchers cautioned that the findings cannot be used to say who is a kohen, they are highly indicative of Jewish ancestry.

But as Parfitt said, the findings do support the Lemba claims to Jewish heritage (he declined a chance to discuss whether they constitute halachic Jews). What's more, "it's increasingly beginning to look as if there was a general movement of Jews [from biblical Israel] to the Indian Ocean area."

The research team was also able to calculate when the present day bearers of the kohanic genetic marker last shared a common ancestor. They reckoned that all the branches of the tree came from a single trunk between 2,650 and 3,180 years ago – dates that roughly correspond to the Exodus from Egypt and the Assyrian invasion that resulted in the scattering of the 10 tribes of Israel.

But Parfitt cautions it's fanciful to believe that the Lemba are one of the 10 lost tribes of biblical Israel. Unlike the Falashas of Ethiopia, they do not want to go to Israel. The South African Jewish community has made contact with the Lemba, and is sending them religious supplies and books, he noted.

Parfitt said what he finds amazing is that barely 50 years after the Holocaust, "there are people on this planet who actually want to be Jews."

Parfitt's Toronto appearance served as the inaugural event for Kulanu Canada, a group dedicated to aiding Jews in far-flung places and who often claim "lost tribe" status.

These include the Lemba; the B'nai Menashe of India; the fabled Kaifeng Jews of China; the Abayudaya of Uganda; a group of Inca Indians in Trujillo, Peru who embraced Judaism in 1966; and a group of descendants of Moroccan Jews now living as Muslims in Timbuktu, Mali.

Kulanu Canada and its U.S.-based parent, Kulanu ("All of Us") send these groups religious artifacts and books, and collect money to enable them to immigrate to Israel. It also offers a pen-pal program.

The group can be reached at: Kulanu Canada, 130 Neptune Dr., suite 809, Toronto, M6A 1X5 or via e-mail at: kulanu-canada@thebigdipper.net

JVS retail course teaches stress management

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Acieh Roshani stayed home for three-and-a-half years taking care of her young son.

Now, she wants to go back to work.

But the 31-year-old, who immigrated to Canada from Iran in 1996 faces a major obstacle – she has no Canadian experience.

Roshani is one of eight students enrolled in the first-ever Jewish Vocational Service of Greater Toronto retail training course.

Toronto is Canada's largest retail market, representing $33 billion in sales or 14 percent of total sales in Canada, according to a 1998-1999 Toronto Board of Trade publication titled A Profile of Toronto and the GTA.

David Heller is seen in the JVS retail store. Ninety-five per cent of goods were donated by companies in the Jewish community.

Ten or 15 years ago, it was easier to get a retail job without having the necessary skills, says Allan Fryman, manager of program development and skills training at JVS.

But the market has changed, according to Fryman.

"Nowadays, almost every job out there, even a short order cook in a greasy spoon has to show a résumé. Retail has become far more sophisticated than it was a number of years ago."

So, JVS has introduced a six-week program that teaches students technical skills such as how to use a scanner, cash register or debit machine, how to price items, as well as customer service skills.

The course aims to also improve students' self confidence, teach stress-management, and advises on how to deal with hostile customers.

The eight students in this inaugural class have all received funding from the government.

Most students in the program face barriers to employment, such as a disability, age, or lack of experience.

The students spend four weeks at JVS's head office at 74 Tycos Dr. where their training includes working in JVS's on-site store, listening to guest speakers and going out on field trips.

Les Klein, who has worked in retail management for 30 years, recently spoke to the class about the basics of retailing and what employers look for in an employee.

Instructor Louie Locsin, who says he coaches rather than teaches his students, uses games, role-playing and presentations to train the class.

Student David Heller says the course teaches that there is a lot more to retail than it seems.

"There is a certain attitude you have to have towards it to be successful," he said.

One major lesson Heller said he learned is the importance of being patient with customers.

"Even if you are answering some question over and over, you have to be able to do that. It takes a great deal of patience and social skills."

Parenting issues addressed in tribute to Ruth Kelman

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Lynne Heller graduated from Brooklyn College in 1966, she wanted to pursue a doctorate in Hebrew. A professor asked her, "What are you going to do with it? You can't be a rabbi."

Heller has a PhD in English Literature from New York University, but her first love has always been Jewish studies. A professor of Bible Studies at Hebrew College in Brookline, Mass., Heller was in Toronto recently as scholar-in-residence for Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's Ruth Kelman Memorial Weekend, a sisterhood event.

Heller gave three talks over the weekend, addressing parenting issues such as favouritism, assimilation and intermarriage through her interpretations of biblical text.

"The ancient voices impart to us a modern message for our own lives," she said.

In the story of Jacob and his half-Egyptian grandsons Ephraim and Menashe, for example, there is a message "that a parent or grandparent can reach out to children at any stage in their lives and connect or reconnect them spiritually."

In fact, Heller noted over the weekend, Ruth Kelman understood very well that Jews can be lost not only through assimilation but also by being marginalized. Kelman's work with Kadimah "provided access points to Judaism" for disabled children, Heller said.

Heller had met Kelman, but didn't know her personally, she said in an interview on her arrival here. She felt the concept of teaching Torah to commemorate Kelman's life of Torah was a great tribute. Kelman died last June of cancer.

Heller, 54, is the founder of Kolot Bik'dushah, an international corps of women skilled as Torah readers and/or shlichot tzibur. Although the group evolved, as Heller puts it, as a result of North American women taking their "rightful – and riteful – place on the synagogue bimah," she said she feels totally comfortable at Beth Emeth, a Conservative synagogue where women do not read Torah on the bimah.

"I understand that not every community is on the same spiritual page," she said, noting that the fact that women do not read Torah in a particular synagogue does not make the synagogue any less spiritual.

Like her husband, Rabbi Zachary Heller – a past president of the World Council of Conservative/Masorti Synagogues who, when asked what kind of rabbi he is, answers "Jewish" – Heller prefers to avoid denominational labels and focus on the concept of Klal Yisrael.

"I grew up in an Orthodox home," she said, "yet my level of observance is no different now than it was then."

Heller imagines if she were the age of her daughter, Miriam, who will begin a PhD program in history and Jewish education this fall, she would seriously consider entering rabbinical school.

Women explore meaning of Judaism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

MARKHAM, Ont. — God can speak in one voice, and we can hear thousands of messages that we were meant to share, said Rachael Turkienicz, a Jewish educator and moderator of a recent panel of women representing different streams of Judaism.

Jews may disagree on certain issues, but they do not need to be disagreeable, said Turkienicz, summing up one of the points made by panelist, Tova Kelman Gutenberg.

The panel, entitled What My Form of Judaism Means to Me, was sponsored by Shaar Shalom Synagogue Sisterhood. It included Gutenberg, Susan Haber and Sheila Smolkin, and was dedicated to the memory of Ruth Kelman, mother of Gutenberg, and wife of Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

The women in the panel may express their Judaism differently and pray in different venues, said Turkienicz, "but they have been brought together because historically, there has been a place for women to come together and share."

Gutenberg, who described herself as a Torah observant Jew, said that labels are helpful in the supermarket, "but they can be damaging when they are applied to people."

It is a constant struggle to live by the Torah and live in the world around us, she said. "It is safer to shut out the world, but that is not fulfilling the key role of a Jew – contributing and making a difference in the world. We cannot do that if we shut ourselves out."

Haber, who called Adath Israel Synagogue her "spiritual home," said that she is also comfortable davening behind a mechitzah and studying at a Reform kolel. "My approach to Judaism is eclectic. It is not easy to place a label on me; all of those things shape my identity."

The core of her Judaism, she said, is related to God. "It is a profound relationship. I cannot specify what Judaism means without talking about God. The relationship with God, however, is not only individual, it takes place in the family context and within the context of the community.

"In all of our diversity we are one people. May we learn to listen to one another," said Haber.

Smolkin, a member of Holy Blossom Temple, converted to Judaism as an adult, and subsequently became a bat mitzvah. "Chanting the Torah was, for me, a spiritual high. It was a significant step forward in my Jewish understanding."

Recognizing the "importance of mitzvot, I worked on the committee that helped found Holy Blossom's Plaut Manor, [an affordable housing unit for people of all ages], on the temple's Out of the Cold program, and as part of a group that helped women escape abusive family situations.

"I believe that we all have to try to come to terms with what Judaism means, no matter where we find ourselves."

Linguist stresses need to respect those with autism

TORONTO — We should respect people with autism just as they are, says Dorit Ben-Shalom of the department of foreign literatures and linguistics at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Ben-Shalom is the first recipient of the Toronto Prize for Excellence in Research, awarded by a panel of BGU officials in collaboration with the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University.

Michael Wynston, president of the Toronto chapter, said the prize was established in order to mark Israel's 50th anniversary, and to link the city of Toronto and Ben-Gurion University in perpetuity.

The award was created at BGU to recognize outstanding achievement in science and technology, medicine or the humanities for the betterment of mankind.

Ben-Shalom, a theoretical linguist, completed her PhD in linguistics at the University of California at Los Angeles in 1996. In 1997 she visited a summer camp for high functioning people with autism, and the experience changed the direction of her research. She volunteered as a support person to parents of autistic children and began formulating her theories.

Her research concentrates on the neural basis of emotional functioning in people with autism.

Emotional processing can be divided between physical emotions (being in a state of fear), and cognitive feelings (being afraid). An important question is whether people with autism have any "standard" physical emotions. If it turns out that they do, then some people with autism might be taught to label their emotional states by observing their physical reactions.

The outcome of this research has the potential to have a significant effect on the quality of life of some people with autism.

Ben-Shalom is a member of the Zlotowski Centre for Neurosciences, and conducts her research in the Bioelectrical Laboratory of the department of electrical and computer engineering. She publishes on the neuropsychology of language and the neuropsychology of autism.

JF&CS meets 'highest national standards'

TORONTO — Jewish Family and Child Service has received notification that it has been reaccredited by the Council on Accreditation for Children and Family Services, Inc. (COA).

The announcement was made by Gordon Wolfe, executive director of JF&CS.

Reaccreditation, which is required every four years, attests to the fact that an organization continues to meet the highest national standards, and it provides assurance that the organization is performing services the community needs, conducting its operations safely and managing its funds effectively and wisely.

The reaccreditation process involves an in-depth detailed examination of the organization's operations, including personnel, safety, and fiscal and programs management.

"I am delighted that Jewish Family and Child Service continues to be a part of COA's Community of Excellence and is committed to providing needed quality services to the children, youth and families in Toronto," said David S. Liederman, president and chief executive officer of COA, an independent, non-profit, internationally recognized accreditor of mental health and social service organizations in the United States and Canada.

Islamic influence growing in Israel's Arab community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Islamic fundamentalist movement is playing an increasingly important role in Israel's Arab community, according to a scholar who advised Ehud Barak – the current prime minister – on Israeli Arab affairs in last year's election campaign.

Islamists are gaining popularity because Arab Knesset representatives have failed to close social, economic and political inequality gaps between Jews and Arabs in Israel, said Elie Rekhess, a senior research fellow at Tel Aviv University's Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern Studies.

Rekhess, one of Israel's leading authorities on its large Arab minority, said that Arab MKs have not been able to offer "practical solutions" for these problems because they have no "leverage power" over the government.

Islamists, through their mayors and municipal councillors and their social welfare network, have filled the vacuum, explained Rekhess, the director of the Dayan Center's research program on Arab politics in Israel.

Although Islamic leaders have scrupulously refrained from crossing red lines by espousing terrorism, some of their followers have not been as cautious. As an example, he cited an attempt last September by a pair of Islamists to plant bombs on Israeli buses.

Israeli Arabs have a number of just grievances, noted Rekhess, an advisor to Science Minister Matan Vilna'i, the chair of the Ministerial Committee on the Arabs in Israel. Its function is to improve conditions among Israeli Arabs.

Under the strict letter of the law, Arabs, comprising about 19 percent of Israel's population, enjoy the same rights and privileges as Jews. In practice, they are subjected to discrimination in everyday life.

"The principle of equality has not been implemented in the full sense," observed Rekhess, who was here under the auspices of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and B'nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs.

In comparison to the Jewish sector, Israeli Arab towns and villages receive proportionately less government funding for municipal needs and economic development projects, he pointed out.

There is also a dearth of land for new housing, while the question of unrecognized Arab settlements – which usually have no basic services – has yet to be addressed.

Israel, he added, should increase the proportion of Arabs in the civil service and start dealing with the higher Arab unemployment rate.

In addition, the government must come to grips with the welfare crisis in the Bedouin community, whose annual five percent growth rate is the highest in the world. "It's a ticking time bomb," he warned.

Elie Rekhess

Rekhess said that the participation of three Druze local municipalities in last month's Land Day general strike was a reflection of growing Druze dissatisfaction with government policy. Israeli Arabs have marked Land Day every year since 1976, when six Arab civilians were shot to death by police while protesting Israel's policy of Arab land expropriation.

Nonetheless, Arabs and Jews have found a way of living together. "We shouldn't forget that Arab-Jewish coexistence is one of Israel's greatest achievements," he commented.

Rekhess said that Barak missed a golden opportunity to significantly enhance Arab-Jewish relations when he chose not to appoint an Arab to his cabinet. Barak's decision upset Israeli Arabs because 95 percent of them voted for him in 1999.

In an effort to explain Barak's thinking, Rekhess said: "He saves his energies for one single aim: the promotion of the peace process. He was apprehensive that the inclusion of an Arab in the cabinet would alienate some Jewish supporters, whose backing he needs to advance peace negotiations (with the Palestinians and Syria). Not wanting to take a risk, Barak sacrificed the Arab voter for the sake of the peace process."

Barak may ultimately regret his decision. "Ignoring the Arab sector politically is a big mistake for which Israel will have to pay," he said without elaborating.

Rekhess expressed satisfaction with two recent developments.

He praised a landmark Supreme Court ruling forbidding a village built solely for Jews from barring an Israeli Arab couple, saying that it strengthened Israeli democracy. And he said that Interior Minister Natan Sharansky's restoration of land wrested from the Arab village of Kfar Kassem was an unprecedented step in the right direction.

Rekhess was skeptical about the veracity of a survey on Israeli Arab identity conducted recently by the Givat Haviva Center for Peace Research. It found that most Arab citizens define themselves as Palestinians, while only 11 percent regard themselves as Israeli Arabs and four percent as Israelis.

Arabs, he claimed, are in fact becoming more Israelized and more integrated into Israeli society. But in his view, Arab political and intellectual elites are basically alienated from Israel, and their ideas are rubbing off on younger, better educated, nationalist-inclined Arabs.

In general, these elites want to strip Israel of its Jewish and Zionist content and transform it into a fully egalitarian secular "state of its citizens." Among these groups there is also talk of cultural, institutional or territorial autonomy and of a bi-national state in place of Israel.

A tiny radical faction calls for Israel's destruction.

Rekhess said that Israeli Arabs have proven their loyalty since 1948. But if there is a new war pitting Israel against the Palestinians, the reactions of Israeli Arabs may pose a serious threat to the state.

PASSOVER FOOD IDEAS

Passover recipes can be both healthy and enticing

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Gail Ashkanazi-Hankin has made healthy Jewish cooking her specialty. Her first book, Passover Lite Kosher Cookbook (184 pages, 1996, Pelican Publishing), offers a wide variety of healthy, enticing recipes. Her second book, Festivals of Lite (312 pages, 1999, Pelican), offers 230 Jewish holiday and everyday recipes adapted to follow today's trend toward healthier eating.

Festivals of Lite is a fascinating global tour of Jewish cuisine. Ashkanazi-Hankin compares and contrasts the food history and lore of Jews from all over the world, sharing Jewish holiday food customs of Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews. Her dishes originate from Russia, Poland and Germany, as well as from Morocco, Greece, Romania, Italy, India, Brazil, Gibraltar, Tunisia, Israel and Afghanistan. There is also a comprehensive Passover section.

In both of her books, each recipe is designated meat, dairy or pareve for easy meal planning, and includes a nutritional analysis. Many have serving suggestions and variations. The author has transformed these rich, traditional recipes into reduced fat and reduced calorie versions, while maintaining the delicious flavours of the original dishes. She lightens her recipes by using lowfat dairy products, defatted broth, cooking spray and easy, common-sense techniques. Most recipes contain from zero to four grams of fat.

Ashkanazi-Hankin, who is also an artist-illustrator, created the eye-catching front covers and pen and ink drawings that appear throughout both of her books. She lives in Denver, Colo. with her husband Larry, who is the editor of the Intermountain Jewish News. Her cookbooks are available at most bookstores and Jewish gift shops.

Here are a few of Ashkanazi-Hankin's favourite recipes. Some are suitable for the seders; others are perfect for meals during the week of Passover. Enjoy!

ROASTED TURKEY TZIMMES

4-lb. boneless turkey breast
1 lemon, sliced
2 sprigs each sage, thyme and rosemary
Olive oil spray
1 onion, coarsely chopped
2 sweet potatoes, peeled and cut into chunks
3 carrots, cut into 1-in. pieces
1 large tart apple, cut into 8 wedges
2 tbsp. brown sugar or honey
1½ cups defatted chicken broth
½ cup dry red wine
2 garlic cloves, chopped
2 tsp. potato starch

Carefully separate skin from turkey breast fillets, and place lemon slices between skin and meat. Place 1 sprig of each herb under the skin.

Place in a glass baking dish or roasting pan. Coat a non-stick skillet with the olive oil spray. Over medium heat, add the onion, sweet potatoes, carrots and apple, and cook for 5-6 minutes. Sprinkle with the brown sugar.

Arrange the vegetables in the baking dish around the turkey. Bake uncovered at 400 degrees for 40 minutes or until the turkey reaches 160 degrees and the meat is no longer pink. Remove the vegetables and keep warm.

In a saucepan, combine all the chicken broth, wine, and garlic. Stir in the potato starch. Bring to a boil to thicken slightly, stirring constantly. Slice the turkey and transfer it to a platter. Spoon vegetables around turkey and drizzle gravy onto turkey and vegetables.

Garnish with extra herb sprigs and lemon wedges. Serves 8.

GRILLED PEPPER SALAD

3 lb. green, red or yellow bell peppers
2-3 hot green peppers
6-7 garlic cloves, minced
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
3 tbsp. lemon juice
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. white pepper

Grill or broil the peppers whole on all sides until the skin is somewhat charred (about 15 minutes). Place in a paper or plastic bag, and let sit for a few minutes to loosen the skin. Peel the skin. (Do this over the sink, frequently rinsing hands with water. You can also scrape the skin off with a paring knife.) Remove seeds, slice peppers into 1-inch strips and place in a bowl.

In a small bowl, whisk garlic, olive oil, lemon juice, salt and pepper, and stir gently into the peppers. Adjust seasonings to taste. Serves 8-10.

Passover Food Ideas

Broccoli knishes served on the side

Cooking spray
1/4 cup chopped scallions
8 oz. mushrooms, coarsely chopped
4 cups fresh spinach
6 1/2-oz. can water-packed tuna, drained
2 oz. smoked salmon
1/2 cup lowfat cottage cheese
1 tsp. lemon juice
4 egg whites
1/4 cup Passover egg substitute (or 3 eggs)
2 tbsp. fresh dill or 1 1/2 tsp. dried dill
1/8 tsp. black pepper
2 tbsp. grated lowfat cheese (e.g. cheddar, gruyere, or a combination)

Preheat oven to 350. Soak farfel in a large bowl of boiling water until water is absorbed. Spray a non-stick skillet with cooking spray. Over medium-high heat, saute scallions and mushrooms for 2-3 minutes. Reduce heat to medium and add spinach. Cover and cook a few minutes until the spinach wilts. Remove from heat. Chop the spinach a little while it still in the skillet. Add spinach mixture to the farfel.

Mix in remaining ingredients except cheese.

Coat a 10-inch square baking dish with cooking spray, including the sides; pour mixture in. Top with grated cheese. Bake uncovered for 50-55 minutes. Serves 6.

CHICKEN IN ORANGE SAUCE

6 chicken breast halves, skinned
3 tbsp. orange juice concentrate, thawed
1 cup defatted chicken broth or water
3 whole cloves
3 in. cinnamon stick
1/4 tsp. black pepper
Pinch cayenne pepper, to taste
1 1/2 tsp. potato starch
Garnish: orange slices, parsley sprigs

In a non-stick skillet, over medium-high, brown chicken breasts on both sides in the orange juice concentrate and 1/4 cup of the broth, about 10-12 minutes. Add cloves, cinnamon stick, pepper, cayenne and 1/2 cup of the broth. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat to medium-low, cover and simmer 7-10 minutes or until chicken is no longer pink inside.

With the remaining 1/4 cup broth, blend in potato starch and stir until smooth. Add mixture to skillet. Stir until gravy thickens and begins to bubble. Arrange chicken on platter and pour sauce over, or pass sauce around. Garnish with oranges and parsley. Serves 4-6.

BROCCOLI KNISHES

These could be served as a side dish, but are filling enough to be the main dish.

1 cup mashed potatoes
1/3 cup matzah meal
2 tbsp. potato starch
1/2 of a small onion, finely chopped
2 egg whites or 1/4 cup egg substitute
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup fresh or frozen broccoli, steamed and finely chopped
Cooking spray

Preheat oven to 375. In a bowl, combine potatoes, matzah meal, potato starch, onion, egg whites, pepper and salt, and knead together.

Divide dough into 6 balls and flatten each. Divide the broccoli evenly onto each circle, fold over and press edges to seal. Generously coat a baking sheet with cooking spray. Arrange knishes in a single layer and place baking sheet on bottom rack of oven. Bake 15 minutes on each side. Serve hot. Serves 6.

CHOCOLATE RASPBERRY PUDDING

1 package Passover instant chocolate pudding mix (sugar-free if available)
1 1/2 cups cold skim milk
1 1/2 tbsp. raspberry preserves (sugar-free if available)
1 cup plain nonfat yogurt

In a medium bowl, sprinkle pudding mix over milk. On lowest speed of mixer, beat 30 seconds.

Combine the raspberry preserves into yogurt and add to pudding mixture.

Beat 30 seconds more or until thickened. Pour into dessert dishes and chill before serving.

Variation: For Chocolate mocha pudding, omit raspberry preserves and mix 1 1/2 tsp instant decaffeinated coffee granules into yogurt. Follow above instructions. Serves 4.

CJN fails to resolve the great knaidel dispute

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

The matzah ball or knaidel is an Ashkenazi dish that is traditionally associated with Passover. Made of matzah meal and eggs, the knaidel, essentially a dumpling, was only eaten at Passover because in prewar Europe, or at least eastern Europe, matzah was available only during that holiday.

In the old country, a knaidel was a knaidel. But on this side of the Atlantic, people are divided over what constitutes a true matzah ball – the rock-hard golf ball variety or the light, fluffy type that floats in the soup.

Sinkers or floaters? Family feuds have begun and couples have been known to divorce over the issue.

The CJN recently launched an investigative report on matzah balls – culinary experts were consulted and a survey of CJN staffers was conducted.

Unfortunately, the results were inconclusive. There does not seem to be a definitive answer as to the origins of sinker and floater knaidlach, but there are plenty of theories. Ditto for anecdotes.

Sarah Laiken of The CJN advertising department says her knaidlach definitely float. "It's a disaster if they sink. My mother made them from scratch. They were light and fluffy and always rose to the top. That was the test if they were going to be any good."

Gloria Clamen, also from sales, is a convert to floaters, she says. "I come from a family of sinkers who have elevated themselves to floaters."

Honey Mahl of sales remembers her grandmother's knaidlach as being "hard like rocks. We could use them as hockey pucks. All the bubbies made them hard. They didn't know from measurement. We didn't know any differently. We thought that's the way it should be."

But Mahl says the next generation improved upon the old recipe."My mother made really good ones. They were floaters."

Writer Cynthia Gasner, also raised on sinkers, says she made knaidlach, from scratch. But for one seder years ago, she used a matzah ball mix to save time. She says the end result was great tasting, light knaidlach and her family has been hooked on floaters ever since.

Speaking of mixes, writer Leila Speisman tells of her aunt Clara, who for years spent hours beating egg whites for the perfect light knaidlach, only to discover that she could get the same results in minutes by using a mix.

Float like a butterfly, sink like a stone

But some people raised on floaters have developed a preference for sinkers. Copy editor Carolan Halpern says her husband is a case in point. His mother took tremendous pride in her light-as-a-feather knaidlach, notes Halpern.

But one Passover, a guest, Mrs. Starkman, offered to make the matzah balls. Her knaidlach were most definitely sinkers.

"My husband loved them and I decided to learn Mrs. Starkman's recipe. She didn't beat her egg whites, which made it easier," recalls Halpern, who continues to make Mrs. Starkman's recipe to this day.

CJN food editor Carolyn Blackman, a definite sinker devotee, says she'd rather fight than switch. Ditto for Lisa Freid and Ella Burakowski of the sales department.

Advertising sales manager Vera Gilman says she likes her mother's matzah balls, which "start out as floaters but become sinkers waiting for people to eat them when they boil a little longer.

"My mother is from a small town that was on the border of Hungary and Czechoslovakia. The secret to her matzah balls is the ginger," Gilman says.

Copy editor Anna Morgan grew up with both sinkers and floaters – her father's family likes them light; her mother makes the sinker variety. "I enjoy them both," Morgan says.

And CJN food columnist Norene Gilletz is of the same mind. "I love matzah balls. I'll take them any way I get them," says the author of Meal-Lean i Yumm (Gourmania Inc.)

She says people's knaidel preference is usually in sync with their family's tradition, although people have been known to improvise. She says one woman updated the recipe by freezing the mixture in an ice cube tray; she ended up with square matzah balls.

Gilletz says knaidlach come in many varieties – her mother filled them with cottage cheese – and she's heard of people adding fresh parsley or dill, or a pinch of ginger. There's even a Tex Mex variety with chopped jalapeno peppers.

One of Gilletz's tricks to keeping her knaidlach light is to add soda water to the mixture.

Author of the HeartSmart cookbook series and television personality Bonnie Stern also says a preference for hard or soft matzah balls tends to correspond with one's family tradition.

She says one cannot attribute the hardness or softness of the matzah ball to any one particular cooking procedure because there are many variables. "I can never tell how mine will turn out…I always aim for floaters. But every once in awhile they sink."

CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat, who grew up eating sinkers, believes that the differences between hard and soft matzah balls are geographical in origin. He surmises that the floater is a product of western European Ashkenazi cuisine, while the sinker reflects the heartier utilitarian fare of eastern European Jews.

Publisher Thelma Barer-Stein, author of You Eat What You Are (distributed by Firefly Books), a compendium of international food traditions, says that while dumplings probably originated in China, the origin of matzah balls, like gefilte fish, can be traced to the former Czechoslovakia, the dumpling capital of the world.

Whether they sink or float, they're a Passover tradition

However, Barer-Stein, who is also the co-author of the kosher cookbook To Life, says the geographical origins of dense and light matzah balls are more difficult to pinpoint and that it is safer to simply attribute the differences to family traditions.

She herself grew up with light, fluffy matzah balls made by her Austrian-born mother.

One can only conclude that while there are many dietary laws in the Jewish tradition, there is no single standard for the density of matzah balls. It all boils down to: à chacun son gout.

Here are some matzah ball recipes garnered from the experts. For the sake of caution, we are not giving the recipes a floater or sinker designation. Generally, beating egg whites separately or adding soda water are recommended steps for producing a lighter knaidel, while more matzah meal will increase density. But there are no guarantees.

ROSE HALPERN'S MATZAH BALLS

From Vera Gilman's mother.

Use approximately 1 egg per person
10 eggs
10 half-egg shells filled with water
Salt
Pepper
Powdered ginger
Matzah meal

Separate egg yolks from white and beat egg whites until stiff. While beating, add salt, pepper and powdered ginger to taste and then add 10 half-egg shells of water to white mixture.

Slow beater down and fold in egg yolks.

Slowly pour matzah meal into mixture while continuously folding into mixture with a spoon (quantity used will determine whether matzah balls float or sink).

For floaters, pour enough matzah meal while stirring to end up with a wet, sticky mixture that will stick to the mixing spoon. For sinkers, add more matzah meal to make a drier mixture.

Put the mixture into the fridge for at least 1 hour.

When ready to make the matzah balls, boil soup (chicken or vegetable), wet hands with cold water and form matzah balls with hands. Drop balls individually into boiling water. Leave them on a medium boil for 10-20 minutes, depending on their size and quantity. This recipe serves about 10 people.

MATZAH BALLS

From Heart Smart Cooking for Family and Friends, by Bonnie Stern (Random House Canada)

1 egg
2 egg whites
¼ cup matzah meal
1 / tsp. salt
2 tbsp. chicken soup
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

In a medium bowl, beat egg whites. Add matzah meal, salt, chicken soup and parsley. Cover and refrigerate for 30 minutes.

Wet your hands with cold water and shape mixture into 10 to 12 balls.

Bring a large pot of water to a boil. Add matzah balls gently and simmer for 40 minutes. Remove from water and serve in strained chicken soup.

MATZAH BALLS OR SOUP DUMPLINGS (Knaidlach)

From To Life: Setting a New Standard for Delectable Healthy Eating Within Cherished Kosher Traditions, by Thelma Barer-Stein, Esther Schwartz, Risa Vandersluis.

These are usually served in a clear broth, but can be used as a side dish with meat or fish. The versions given here result in either a fluffy dumpling (made with soda water) or a firm, chewy one (made with broth). There may also be some disagreements between families as to whether the ideal knaidlach should be like a cloud (made with soda water) or like a golf ball (made with broth). It depends on what is traditional in your family. This recipe can be easily increased.

In mixing bowl combine and beat till fluffy:
4 beaten eggs
¼ cup chicken or vegetable broth or soda water
Salt

Fold in:
1 cup matzah meal
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley or 2 tsp. dried parsley
Ginger and/or chopped bitter almonds (optional)

Cover and refrigerate the mixture for 1 hour. Stir, then shape with moistened hands into 8 large (or 16 small) balls or oval shapes, using a rounded tbsp. of mixture, or less if you like them small.

Drop into boiling salted water. Cover and simmer 45 minutes. Remove with slotted spoon and transfer to soup.

CORRECTION

In the matzah-veggie pie recipe, in the article titled "Vegetarian Solutions for Pesach Dining" (March 30), the three eggs were omitted in the list of ingredients. The CJN regrets the omission.

Passover Food Ideas

Passover recipe ideas from the Kashruth Council

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, publishes a COR holiday information and recipe pamphlet for each major holiday.

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council provides kashrut and food related information to families across Canada, the United States, and as far as Israel and Europe, says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, the council's executive director.

If you wish to be placed on the COR mailing list (there is no charge), call the Kashruth Council 416-635-9550, or write to 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Willowdale, Ont., M2R 3V2.

Here are some of this year's Passover recipes from the COR flyer.

Please Note: All processed ingredients have to be marked Kosher for Passover.

NUTTY CHEESE BALL

½ lb. cheddar cheese, grated
8 oz. cream cheese, room temperature
3 oz. cottage cheese
½ cup milk
½ tsp. garlic powder
¼ cup finely chopped pecans
2 green eating apples
2 red eating apples
2 tbsp. lemon juice and ¼ cup water, mixed together

In a 2-quart bowl, mix the cheese, milk and garlic powder. Chill until firm (about 3-4 hours). Shape into a ball. Roll ball in chopped pecans. Core apples and cut into thin wedges. Dip apples into lemon juice and water mixture to prevent browning. Place cheese ball in centre of platter. Surround with apple wedges, alternating the red and green. Enjoy spreading the cheese mix on the apple.

AVOCADO SPREAD (Guacamole)

A delicious dip for snacks to serve on matzah crackers or potato chips. Peel and mash a large avocado. Add 1 tbsp. lemon juice, 3 tbsp. chopped onions, 3 tbsp. chopped tomatoes, salt and pepper to taste. Vary the recipe by adding chopped garlic or chopped peppers. For a creamier texture, add 2 tbsp. of yogurt, sour cream or mayonnaise.

EGGPLANT CAVIAR

1 medium-sized eggplant
2 medium-sized garlic cloves, minced
½ tsp. salt
¼ cup olive oil
2 medium-sized onions, finely chopped
3 medium-sized tomatoes, peeled and finely chopped
Salt and pepper to taste

Wash the eggplant. Do not peel. Wrap tightly in aluminum foil. Bake at 350 for about 30 minutes or until soft. (Can be baked in microwave – follow microwave instructions). Peel the eggplant and chop finely. Add remaining ingredients and chop until the mixture is thoroughly blended, or process in food processor. Chill. Serve on Gefrishte Matzah. Yields about 5 cups.

GEFRISHTE MATZAH

Preheat oven to 425. Wet matzah on both sides. Sprinkle with salt, onion powder or garlic powder. Brown in oven 2 minutes on first side; 1½ minutes on second side. For a breakfast treat, spread with 1 tsp. butter or margarine, top with cottage cheese slices or spread with jam.

SUGARED NUTS

1½ cups sugar
¼ cup honey
½ cup water
3 cups halved walnuts or Brazil nuts
½ tsp. vanilla

Combine the sugar, honey and water in a saucepan; cook to the firm ball stage. Remove from heat; add the nuts and vanilla. Stir until the syrup is creamy and thick. Turn onto waxed paper to harden, then break into individual pieces. Add a little grated orange rind or cinnamon to the syrup for variety.

Kashruth Council's recipes for Passover

FISH STICKS (Pareve)

3 slices fillet of sole
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper
¼ cup potato starch
2 eggs, beaten
2 tbsp. white wine
¼ cup matzah meal
1 tbsp. paprika
Oil for deep frying

Cut sole into 1-inch strips. Roll in salt, pepper and potato starch mixture. Dip in egg/wine mixture. Roll in matzah meal/paprika mixture. Deep fry in hot oil until golden (2-3 minutes). Drain. Serve with sauce. Yields approximately 24 pieces.

Sauce:
½ cup ketchup
3 tbsp. horseradish
⅛ tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. lemon juice

Combine all ingredients, mix well. Chill.
Note: To serve hot, place fish on foil-lined cookie sheet in 400-degree oven for 8-10 minutes.

APPETIZING CHOPPED HERRING

1 jar (283 grams) herring fillets in wine marinade
½ cup farfel
2 hard boiled eggs, chopped fine
1 small onion, grated
1 medium apple (skin on) grated
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
½ tsp sugar

Drain liquid from herring. Soak farfel in herring liquid. Chop all ingredients until fine. If using a food processor, turn on/off until desired consistency. Add more sugar on lemon juice if necessary. Refrigerate. Serve on matzah cracker, but do not spread until ready to serve.

CHEESE AND FRUIT APPETIZER

An attractive way of serving this appetizer is to stud a pineapple, grapefruit or red cabbage with prepared cocktail sticks or rounded toothpicks. Alternate cubes of cheese, pecan halves, seedless grapes, orange sections or fruit of your choice on the sticks. Repeat until all the sticks are covered.

LOX CANAPÉS

¼ cup light cream cheese, room temperature
¼ tsp. pepper
¼ lb. thinly sliced lox
24 slices cucumber or matzah crackers
Garnish: chopped olives or parsley sprigs (optional).

Combine cheese and pepper; stir to blend. Spread evenly over each slice of lox. Roll up jelly roll fashion. Place on plate, cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 1 hour or longer. With a sharp knife, cut rolls crosswise into ¼-inch pieces. Place on cucumber slices or matzah crackers. Garnish with olive or parsley sprig if desired.

CHOCOLATE FARFEL SQUARES

6 oz. bittersweet chocolate
½ cup sugar
½ lb. unsalted pareve margarine
2 eggs, room temperature
Pinch salt
1 tbsp. liqueur
1½ cups chopped nuts (pecans, hazelnuts, walnuts)
2 cups farfel (soak in ½ cup hot water for 30 seconds)
1 tbsp. potato starch

Melt chocolate on low heat in double boiler. Beat sugar and margarine on medium speed until mixture is completely smooth. Add eggs, one at a time, and continue beating. Add salt and liqueur, fold in melted chocolate, then fold in farfel and potato starch.

Preheat oven to 325. Spread mixture in a 9 x 13-inch pan that has been well greased and floured with matzah cake meal. Bake for 20-25 minutes. Let cool. Cut in 1-inch or 3-inch squares.

MANGO FRUIT PARFAIT

2 mangoes (peeled)
¼ cup orange juice
24 strawberries, hulled
4 kiwi, peeled and sliced
12 raspberries

Put mangoes and orange juice in blender or food processor and puree until smooth. Slice 20 strawberries, leaving 4 whole. Line bottom of 4 balloon wine glasses with the sliced strawberries. Pour a thin layer of the mango puree over each to cover. Reserving 4 kiwi slices, layer the rest on top of the puree. Divide the remaining mango puree among the glasses. Top each with a slice of kiwi, surrounded by strawberries. Make a slit in each of the whole berries and position one on the rim of each glass. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for 15 minutes or longer.

Passover Food Ideas

Apart from food... a guide to kosher for Passover products

The Kashruth Council of Toronto has circulated a request to drug firms and other related manufacturers asking them to provide a list of ingredients in their products.

All products ingested during Passover should have a kosher for Passover endorsement. If kosher for Passover products are not available and there is a medical need for any of the products, the items should be used in separate utensils.

General Guidelines:

Brown sugar and icing sugar should be used only with Passover supervision.

Cosmetics, toiletries, soap, topical medications, which are in solid form or are thick creams, ointments and salves, may be used (preferably without perfume).

The following items, which are not fit for human consumption (preferably unscented, when applicable) are permissible on Passover (excluding Sabbath and yom tov): nail polish, hand lotion, hand cream, cold cream, unscented baby lotion, baby cream, shampoo (without wheat), shoe polish, ink, paint, solid air freshener, nail polish remover, stick deodorants, eye shadow, eyeliner, mascara, blush and rouge, non-flavoured new lipsticks.

The following may contain chametz: Pet and fish food (i.e., hydrolyzed vegetable protein, starch, etc.), baby powder.

The following are chametz: Play Dough and Postum.

Balloons and rubber gloves may have starches inside.

Plastic bags and wraps do not need kosher supervision when used for cold food.

The following is a COR guide to over-the-counter drugs and household products that may be used for Passover 2000/5760.

Milk Enzyme: Lactaid tablets, caplets and drops should not be used on Passover. In case of great need, lactose free milk should be purchased before Passover. Use separate utensils.

Infant Formula (Kitnyos): All infant formulas listed below should be used in separate utensils. Formula is available in liquid and powder. Check each container for a hechsher, since not all forms are kosher endorsed. Enfalac; Isomil; Prosobee; Simlac; Enfamil.

Nutritional Supplements (Kitnyos): These products are not produced under Passover supervision. They should be used only when there is no alternative in consultation with a rabbi. Boost Liquid only (bars may be chametz); Ensure Nutrition (Ensure Fibre may be chametz); Isocal; Sustacal.

Oral Care: Kosher for Passover toothpaste is recommended. Johnson & Johnson Dental Floss (unwaxed and unflavoured); Polident.

The following oral care products are kitnyos: Toothpaste – Crest Regular, Crest Coolmint Gel, Crest For Kids Sparkle Gel, Colgate Regular, Colgate Superstar, Colgate Gel; Denture care – Fasteeth, Fixodent, Corega; Mouthwash – Listerine, regular, Coolmint, Freshburst, Steri/Sol.

Rubber Gloves: Playtex; Rubbermaid.

Aluminum Products: Special Passover certification is not required; any brand bearing kosher endorsement may be used.

Paper Products: Plates – Use plastic or styrofoam plates for foods that contain moisture. Paper plates are permissible for cold, dry foods. Parchment Paper – Baker's Mate Cooking Parchment Paper, Chefs Select, Peterson/Norscan Silicone Paper; Wax Paper – Cut-Rite.

Most napkins and paper towels contain starch. Therefore some suggest that they not come in contact with wet foods (i.e., latkes). In all cases, it is preferable not to use the first and last three sheets.

Miscellaneous Baby Products: All Alcohol Free Baby Wipes; Johnson's Baby Powder, Johnson's Baby Powder Pure Cornstarch.

Alcohol: Isopropyl rubbing alcohol (any).

Deodorants: Old Spice Stick Deodorant/High Endurance, Old Spice Solid Antiperspirant; Secret Aerosol (all); Mennen Stick (all scents), Mennen Ultimate; Lady Speed Stick (all scents).

Hairspray: Vidal Sassoon; Pantene; Revlon Clear Pump Hair Spray.

Fragrance: Charlie; Jean Nate; Jontue; Revlon fragrances; Ultima II fragrances.

Skin Care: Almay Time-Off Toner, Almay Time-Off Moisture Lotion, Almay Time-Off Cleanser; Revlon Results Day-Light Replenisher Moisture Lotion/Moisturizer Oil-Free Fluid; Moon Drops Nourishing/Soothing Moisture Lotion; Revlon Moisturestay Lipliner.

After Shave: Old Spice (regular and sensitive); Blue Stratos; Mennen Skin Bracer (all fragrances), Mennen Afta Shave (all fragrances).

Shampoo and Conditioners: Head & Shoulders; Pert Plus; Ivory Plus shampoos; Vidal Sassoon; Pantene; Flex.

Cleansers: Spic and Span powder; Mr. Clean; Murphy's Oil Soap; Ajax powder.

Spray Starch: Glide Liquid Starch (Kitnyos).

Dishwashing Detergents: Manual Dishwashing Liquid (must bear an OU) – Dawn, Ivory, Joy, Palmolive; Automatic Dishwashing Detergents (must bear a COR) – Calgonite, Electrosol lemon and regular.

Silver Polish: All Silver Polish with an OU may be used.

Medication: Generally, when taking medication during Passover, preference should be given to non-chewable tablets rather than liquids and chewable tablets. Many products contain ingredients that are only permitted to be used on Passover for medical reasons. A competent rabbi who is familiar with the information needed must be consulted prior to the use of these products. If there is any item that you must take during Passover and it is not found with reliable Passover supervision, please contact your rabbi, who may have additional information.

Enlist help of family in preparing for Pesach

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Yes, it's really that time again: time to prepare for Pesach.

Pesach is not the time to be superwoman. Hire as much help as you can – your health and welfare are just as important as any other family expenditure. Enlist everyone in the family. The youngest child can help pick up and dust his toys, clean the toy box and lug groceries and small unbreakable things around.

Teenagers are especially valuable. The very idea that you would clean their room, thus possibly becoming privy to whatever is in there, will send them scurrying to do it themselves. They can also be persuaded to look after places like the den and family room, in the hope that they can find tapes or CDs that have been lost since, well, last Pesach.

When you begin to clean, think first. There is no point in starting with parts of the house that the kids will immediately cover with cookie crumbs.

Don't neglect places like bathrooms, especially if you have young children. You may not think there will be any chametz there, but where do you think they hide things that they don't want their brothers or sisters (or you) to eat?

Considerably before the holiday, sit down and confirm how many people are coming to the seder, as much as possible. (There are always those who wait until the last minute to give you an answer.) Consider, too, who will turn up for other meals during yom tov.

Then, plan menus for each meal. This may seem like a major hurdle, but it will pay dividends when you make up your shopping list, and when you start to cook. It will also save you from realizing, on the morning before the first seder, that you don't have the main ingredient for your vegetable casserole.

There is nothing wrong with supplementing your efforts with prepared food. You may choose to use herbs to give it an extra kick. Lemon juice, garlic powder and pepper added to a dish of grilled veggies can make it quite unique.

Speaking of a shopping list, a great idea is to put it on computer, so that you can keep it from year to year and just add what you need for new recipes.

At the end of the list, add whatever kitchen utensils you need to buy before next Pesach. Don't trust that you will remember to buy a measuring cup, or extra glasses, or plastic gloves. Chances are you will unpack the Pesach dishes and then remember. You will have to send your husband or kids out to the nearest department store at 10 at night.

Also include reminders like the sizes of table coverings and counter covers that you need. There are some efficient people who use the same ones year after year, a considerable saving in money and time. I admire them.

Getting ready for Pesach is a mammoth undertaking, and it is easy to get bogged down in minutiae. But from time to time, stop and consider the significance of the whole thing.

You are not just cleaning the house – as one rabbinic wag put it, "Dirt isn't chametz." You are, in truth, obeying God's commandment "that thou mayst remember the day when thou camest out of the land of Mitzrayim all the days of thy life… there shall be no leaven seen with thee in all thy borders for seven days." (Deuteronomy 15: 3-4).

Acknowledging the holiness of seemingly mundane acts elevates not only those acts, but those who perform them as well.

Chametz to the homeless

Every year, Jews get rid of their chametz (food they are not permitted to eat during Passover). This year Ve'ahavta is asking the community to give its chametz to the homeless.

There is a serious need in the street for canned and packaged goods. Ve'ahavta will distribute the chametz through the Na Me Res (Native Men's Residence) Street Help Clothing & Resource Centre.

The following foods are the most needed non-perishable items:

- Canned beans, any kind, particularly those high in protein
- Canned corn
- Canned vegetables
- Noodles/pasta
- Canned soup
- Canned fruit
- Tuna and salmon and other canned fish
- Canned luncheon meats
- Granola and breakfast bars

Your chametz can be dropped off at Na Me Res at 14 Vaughan Rd. If you can't drop it off, please call Carry at 416-653-3091.

For further information about Ve'ahavta, call Avrum at 416-964-7698 ext. 3.

Cooking at Passover, some tips from a maven

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Esther Schwartz, a food demonstrator, kosher food consultant at the Kashruth Council of Toronto and award-winning culinary expert, has been helping new and seasoned homemakers make food presentation more creative and she has taught them how to cope with their individual needs.

Schwartz was instrumental in the formation of the Jewish chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association and she received an Appreciation Award from the Ontario Division of the Canadian Diabetes Association in recognition of her voluntary support.

She is also a bronze medal winner at Israel's First International Conference and Exhibition on Jewish Culinary Art.

Schwartz has presented kosher food demonstrations for national television and has written food-related articles for The Canadian Jewish News, the Toronto Star, the Toronto Sun and many other periodicals and newspapers. She is co-author of the cookbook To Life.

In an interview, Schwartz offered some valuable information – tips for Passover and throughout the year.

Esther Schwartz

She notes that Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews often follow different guidelines for Passover. When in doubt, she suggests, "consult your rabbi."

"Many recipes can be adapted for Passover use," she says. You can use matzah meal for bread or cracker crumbs; ground mandeln can be used for a nice golden colour to coat chickens; to substitute for graham crackers, use cookie crumbs, eier kichlach or mandelbrot. To replace vanilla, use Passover liqueur.

There are many substitutes, Schwartz said:

One-quarter cup matzah cake meal plus ¼ cup potato starch equals one cup flour.

To make ¼ cup confectioners' sugar (icing sugar), combine ¼ cup sugar processed in a blender or food processor with ½ tsp. potato starch.

One tbsp. potato starch equals 1 tbsp. cornstarch.

Break up 3½ matzot to equal 2 cups farfel.

If you run out of matzah meal, process broken matzah or farfel in blender or food processor to medium or fine consistency.

If you run out of cake meal, process matzah meal to a very fine consistency.

When stuffing fowl, pack filling loosely, filling the bird only ⅔ full, as stuffing expands when cooked.

Schwartz cautions: "Never freeze the stuffing with the fowl as bacteria begin to grow instantly."

For individuals with diabetes, Schwartz offers this information:

1 matzah (6-inch square) equals 1 starchy choice
1 whole wheat matzah (⅔ oz.) equals 1 starchy choice
½ cup farfel equals 1 starchy choice
6 mandeln equal 1 starchy choice plus 1 fats and oil choice
2½ tbsp. potato starch equals 1 starchy choice
1 cup matzah meal equals 4 starchy choices

Eggs are used plentifully on Passover. Schwartz says that egg whites beat up more quickly and with more volume if you bring them to room temperature. Before beating, add a pinch of salt and some lemon juice. They separate more easily when they are taken from the refrigerator. Do not beat eggs in a plastic bowl.

When in doubt consult your rabbi

Never freeze stuffing with the fowl

'Poor, hapless Joe'

A close colleague of ours is forever cautioning people to choose words carefully. Her pet peeve is the inappropriate and overuse of the word "pathetic." Even she, however, couldn't disagree with the characterization of Joe Clark and his dwindling band of followers as the most pathetic spectacle colouring the current political landscape.

Admittedly, the word is harsh. But how else to classify his chronic penchant for saying the wrong thing, making the wrong decision and backing the wrong cause any and every time a choice presents itself.

Clark's most recent preoccupation centres on the Canadian Alliance's use of the word Conservative in its formal name. He argued (and lost) before Canada's Chief Electoral Officer, Pierre Kingsley, that the PC Party has sole proprietary rights to the word and that the use of the word by the Canadian Alliance would confuse voters.

The larger consensus on the Hill is that it is Joe who is confused. And, in truth, who could blame him? He has just come out of a week of intensive efforts to address the numbing $9 million debt – a 'conservative' estimate faced by his party. He didn't even manage to make a dent in the total. Adding salt to his wounds was news that Ontario provincial Tories are comfortable backing the new Canadian Alliance – all but dashing his hopes to serve as the spoiler in the next federal election.

The problem is that every one of his ill-advised choices is being met on the Hill with rueful shakes of the head and a resigned "Poor, hapless Joe." But in fact, Joe Clark and those supporters of his who cannot bring themselves to face the truth (including more than a few old Jewish Tories) are doing a terrible disservice to the country.

Whatever else he may be, Joe Clark is not harmless. His unwillingness to recognize the new reality of federal politics has done serious damage to the collective effort to provide a credible alternative to the Liberal government.

Every development over the last period of time would draw anyone to an inescapable conclusion. Clark's position on the Clarity Bill, his decision not to run for a seat in the House, his refusal to explore the possibility of a Reform-Tory strategic alliance, his miscalculation about the new Canadian Alliance, and other decisions, should signal a graceful exit off the political stage. And, to anyone other than Joe Clark they would. Like we said, "pathetic" is a harsh word...alas, it's the only one that fits!

בעוד מספר שנים יעלה לשלטון בנו רופא העיניים, ואולי הוא יצליח לשנות את זווית הראייה ואת חדות העין של העם העני והחשוך הזה, שמספר תושביו גדול משל ישראל, אך כלכלתו היא אחוזים בודדים בלבד מכלכלת ישראל.

כל מי שקורא עיתונים כחול לבן, שם לב לתופעה שלפחות פעם בשבוע עולה פרשת שחיתויות חדשה לכותרות ראשי ממשלה, שרים, עסקנים החליטו לשפר את חשבון הבנק שלהם, ואפילו נשיא המדינה הצליח לזכות בכותרת בזכות מתנה נדיבה שהיתה יכולה לחפף כל אביון לגביר.

מי יתן וחג החירות הזה יביא לכל אחד מאיתנו את החירות שהוא זקוק לה, ואנשים שונים צריכים לצאת מסוגים שונים של עבדות: כלכלית, בריאותית, נפשית, משפטית, או כל עבדות אחרת שאיננה מאפשרת לנו להיות אנחנו.

Immigration Act diminishes refugee protection: JIAS

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The government's recently released immigration act does little to protect refugees, says Guidy Mamann, an immigration lawyer and president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Toronto.

"It does the opposite – it diminishes refugee protection," he says.

Mamann is critical of the government's plan to have one judge rather than two from the Immigration and Refugee Board hear cases of people claiming to be refugees.

A government news release claims that the majority of these two-member panel decisions were unanimous anyway.

But, Mamann believes the two-judge panel is more just.

"If one [judge] was very conservative, very strict on the law, you had somebody else who might take a more compassionate view. Now if you have someone who's very conservative on the law, you're done like … it's finished."

The proposed legislation, tabled last week, contains another negative for refugees, Mamann says.

Under the previous immigration act, people refused refugee status could appeal to the Federal Court of Canada. Under the new legislation, appeals will instead be brought before a new division of the Immigration and Refugee Board – the very body which originally denied refugee status. So, it will be akin to an employee reviewing a colleague's decision, Mamann says.

The new act will also be retroactive. Immigrants who are mid-stream in the immigration process "will be under a much tougher regime," Mamann says.

The proposed legislation will have serious implications for people who make false refugee claims, says Jack Kugelmass, executive director of JIAS' Toronto office.

In past years, Canada has been accepting fewer and fewer Russian Jewish immigrants who come from Israel claiming they are refugees.

"That option is even more reduced now – it won't be as easy for you to play the system as some did in the past," Kugelmass said.

"Most of them [Russian Jewish immigrants] come here on visitor's visas and they turn around and say they want to stay," Kugelmass said.

Under the proposed legislation, refugee eligibility decisions will be made within 72 hours.

Kugelmass and Mamann agree that the proposed act contains some positive changes.

Since 1997, when the government first began working on the legislation, both JIAS and the Canadian Jewish Congress were consulted on proposed changes to the Immigration Act.

In a letter dated March 1999, JIAS Canada wrote to the government saying that it advocated extending the age limit for a dependent child from under 19 to under 22. This would allow spouses and children to be eligible for immigration processing from within Canada and rescind the government's right of landing fee or "head tax" as it is sometimes known.

The government has conceded to these suggestions both in a recent budget announcement and in the proposed legislation.

In the announcement, the government eliminated the right of landing fee for refugees. In the proposed act, the government plans to allow spouses and children to apply for immigration status from within the country and broaden the definition of family class to include spouses, common-law and same-sex partners.

According to the budget announcement, the government will increase funding for more officers at ports of entry and wants to modernize its tracking system to reduce the backlog of cases.

This new tracking system, called the Global Case Management System, may mean relief for JIAS's clients, some of whom have waited two or three years for their initial interviews, said Mila Voihanski, JIAS Toronto's director of immigrant services.

JIAS plans to continue communicating with the government about the proposed act.

The Canadian Jewish Congress and JIAS are forming a joint committee, comprised of legal experts and immigration advocates, to respond to the legislation.

But the full implications of the proposed legislation will remain unknown until the government introduces regulations, which tend to define terms and lay out criteria, expected to be introduced by the fall.

"The real fight will come when the regulations come out – when we see how it [the act] will be interpreted, said Voihanski.

Canadian women recognized for volunteer work

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The "unknown Helens" were the women Montreal writer and poet Akhtar Naraghi had in mind when she founded the Helen Prize.

These are the women who have made the world a little better but are rarely recognized.

Named for anti-nuclear activist, Helen Caldicott, the prize is a modest one monetarily – $500 each to a Canadian and to someone from outside the country. But it has gained a reputation for nominating women doing humanitarian work that requires courage.

This year's winners of the Canadian prize are Judy Stevens and Carol Lupovitch, who founded and run the Share the Warmth Foundation, a food bank in Point St. Charles, that also encourages the poor to realize their potential through training and self-help.

Over 2,000 food packages are given out each month to the needy of the Point, as well as of Verdun, Little Burgundy and St. Henri.

Share the Warmth prepares and delivers breakfasts, lunches or snacks to 16 schools and community centres for about 3,150 children from low-income families, filling a gap created by government cutbacks.

In addition, more than 200 deliveries a month are made to isolated elderly and disabled people.

The two women were selected from 23 nominations from 17 countries.

Stevens and Lupovich started Share the Warmth 10 years ago. Before that, they had volunteered at the Jewish General Hospital and for Combined Jewish Appeal.

Stevens was in the cosmetics business with her sister-in-law, Linda Hodes, when a woman from the Salvation Army told them about the need to bring food and clothing to the homeless in Montreal.

They agreed to pay the $200 needed to repair a donated truck, and to collect donated clothing in their downtown office.

The project was featured in a newspaper article, which Lupovich read. She offered her services right away.

"When I turned 50, I had a feeling my life was going to change drastically," said Lupovich, now 62. She had lived almost all her life in Westmount and until then had been preoccupied with raising a family.

Hodes has since moved to California.

Stevens, 60, could scarcely have guessed 10 years ago that she would be working full time in a neighbourhood she knew little about previously.

Stevens and Lupovich admit they had no plans when they began and have winged it much of the time.

Things just evolved as they presented themselves, and they learned totally from other people, they said. Unfortunately, there was no shortage of demand for the basic necessities of life. More surprising was the readiness of people to give.

They use words like "magic" and "karma" and "angels" to describe how the project grew from giving away 39 food baskets in its first month through word-of-mouth, to a bustling, non-profit organization that employs seven and has expanded to offering job skills and language training.

The next project is the opening of a teen centre nearby.

Share the Warmth is located in a century-old house on Rushbrooke Street. About 40 volunteers offer their time.

"They come from inside and outside the community. We even have people helping from the Douglas Hospital group home. Everyone blends together," Stevens said.

Not long ago, the group pitched in for a "barn-raising" – actually the renovation of the kitchen – saving the organization thousands of dollars. The kitchen is the heart of the operation, where over 1,000 muffins alone are baked.

The organization relies heavily on donations from the food industry, and every day its truck tours the city picking up what's offered. The food for the school meal program is mostly purchased to ensure that nutritional requirements are met.

Share the Warmth's budget comes from charitable foundations, corporations and the public. Mazon Canada, the Jewish group feeding the hungry on a non-sectarian basis, has been a constant supporter from the beginning.

This year's Helen Prizes were presented at Concordia University. The winner of the international prize was Rima Nasir Tarazi, a Palestinian who is dedicated to the promotion of peace and to helping women and children.

Cross-Canada Round Up

Eruv in West End?

EDMONTON — Mayor Bill Smith met recently with Rabbi Ari Enkin to discuss the creation of an eruv in west Edmonton.

Shuls May Merge

WINNIPEG — The city's two biggest synagogues are discussing a possible merger, among other options. Officials at Rosh Pina and Shaarey Zedek synagogues say nothing is firm yet, but that talks will continue. The city's Jewish population has shrunk over the last 20 years from 16,000 to just over 13,000.

Director to Leave

CALGARY — Joel Miller, executive director of the Calgary Jewish Community Council, has announced that starting in June, he'll become assistant executive director of the Greater Hartford Jewish Community Centre in Hartford, Conn.

Fighting Joblessness

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Family Service Agency (JFSA) has unveiled a plan to help fight unemployment in the city's Jewish community. The program, called Job Match, hopes to pair prospective employees with business leaders in the community.

Promoting Travel

OTTAWA — It was a diplomatic first in Canada: The Palestinian representative to this country, Abdul Bakr Munem, met recently with Israel's consul for tourism, Arie Shevy-Shibi, to promote travel to the Mideast. Their joint appearance, sponsored by the Travel Media Association of Canada, prompted a prolonged standing ovation.

CANADIANS ATTEND D.C. CONFERENCE:

Canada's profile among North American Jewry received a boost recently at the United Jewish Communities 12th Young Leadership Conference in Washington, D.C. The Canadian contingent, which included 60 Torontonians, was the largest group of Canadians to take part in the bi-annual gathering of young Jewish adults from across North America, which attracted 3,200 participants. For the first time ever, the conference's opening ceremony included the Canadian national anthem. Melanie Segal (left), who chaired the 75 member Canadian contingent, is shown presenting Charles and Andrea Bronfman with a plaque in appreciation of their sponsoring a special reception for the Canadians.

Montreal's oldest cemetery victim of neglect, age

MONTREAL — Shattered gravestones, overgrown grass and rotted soil desecrate the Back River Memorial Gardens, Montreal's oldest Jewish cemetery, established in 1867.

Located at the intersection of Sauve and Berri streets, the historical site has been the victim of vandalism and neglect over time.

Recently, a new committee was formed to restore the cemetery.

"The Back River cemetery is a significant part of the Montreal Jewish community's heritage," said Marilyn Blumer, president of FEDERATION CJA. "The cemetery is a long-range community responsibility, to which we are firmly committed."

"We must implement a decisive plan of action to restore the cemetery to its rightful and dignified condition," said Julius Erdstein, president of the board. "It is our responsibility to preserve the memories of the founding members of our community. They must be more than just abandoned memories."

Representatives from Back River Cemetery affiliates joined FEDERATION CJA representatives and community individuals with cemetery expertise, in forming the recently established pro-active Back River Cemetery Board to research solutions concerning the deterioration of the Black River Cemetery.

"We've commissioned several topographical and geological studies of the grounds in order to have a better understanding of the Back River Cemetery's distressing situation," said Seymour Frank, chairman of the board and active community leader.

Vandalism, neglect and time have all played havoc with many gravesites at the Back River Memorial Gardens Cemetery, the Montreal Jewish community's oldest cemetery.

Students learn about political advocacy

By IGAL HECHT
Special to The CJN

On Tuesday, March 28, I joined a group of university and college students on a trip to Ottawa to discover how Canadian politics operates and how we as young Jews can effectively lobby the government on behalf of Israel and other causes.

Called The Political Advocacy Training Conference, it was organized and supported by the Canada-Israel Committee, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, the Jewish Students' Union, UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and Hillel International's Student Initiatives Grant.

The first speaker, Rabbi Reuven Bulka, used passages from the book of Shmot (Exodus I and II, 13:22) to convey that it is up to the individual to decide which form of protest he or she chooses.

"Sometimes, a loud demonstration is not as effective as a silent protest," Rabbi Bulka said.

He also told us to choose our battles. During the convention, a group of Montreal students organized a demonstration near the Iranian embassy. The Toronto group was asked to join, but we had mixed feelings. On the one hand, we wanted to help the 13 Iranian Jews who have been imprisoned for about a year on made-up charges. However, we did not want to miss any parts of the conference or divert media attention away from it.

After some soul searching, many of us decided not to take part, yet some, myself included, decided to participate in the protest.

Rufina Litvak, a student at the University of Toronto, said of the decision to be part of the protest: "I felt more involved because of the Iranian rally."

During the conference, John Harker, a political consultant, gave us some insight into the art of negotiation, which every lobbyist or advocate on the Hill must possess. We learned that in any negotiation, one should look for common ground.

Later, at the 16th Canadian-Israeli Committee Policy Conference, we all felt a sense of excitement in the Ottawa Congress Hall.

"The amount of power that existed in the room was overwhelming and something that students do not experience on a regular basis," said Fareed Kanani, a student from York University.

The conference started with a political party statement from the five parties. This was the most disappointing part of the day, because no political party seemed to have a genuine interest in Israel. Rather, they bombarded us with insignificant personal stories and political rhetoric.

The jewel event of the conference came about 6:30 p.m. A large circle of lights and cameras was set up near the entrance to the dining hall.

Israel's former prime minister Shimon Peres had arrived.

I extended my hand to him and he shook it. I am sure that my hand was just another hand in a sea of hands that he shook that evening. Yet to me, it was a moment that I shall cherish forever.

After this experience, I believe that students want to be involved politically. We simply need the tools, training and education to do so effectively.

Furthermore, as both an Israeli and a Canadian citizen, I was pleasantly surprised to learn the enormous amount of love and support that Canadian Jewry has for Israel. I hope that this continues to develop and grow based on mutual respect and a sense of partnership.

Hillel to assess students' needs at University of Western Ontario

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life is considering studying the University of Western Ontario, a campus it considers under-resourced, to assess the needs of its Jewish students.

The possibility of a study was discussed at Hillel's lay leadership conference last month.

"It [UWO] is probably the most under-served [university] per capita," said Jay Rubin, executive vice-president of Hillel in an interview with The CJN.

Hillel has identified UWO as the campus with the largest number of non-commuter Jewish students next to Queen's University, said Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

The UWO is not an affiliate of Hillel, but is encouraged to access Hillel's grant system, he said.

While UWO has between two and three thousand Jewish students, the campus has only one staff person and a small 8 by 11 office, said Arye Berk, the director of the University of Western Ontario's Jewish Students Union.

Berk says that in the last five years, several factors have contributed to an increased need for services: an increasing number of Jewish students; more students becoming involved in Jewish programming; more assimilated students, and an increasing number of students who are not involved in the JSU.

While Berk has noticed an increased number of students from Toronto who are used to obeying the laws of kashrut, Western has no kosher eateries, he said.

Hillel would work with various Jewish organizations including UIA Federations Canada, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, the London Jewish Federation, UWO's Jewish Students' Union and UJA FEDERATION to complete a needs assessment. Then, an action plan would be devised to develop stronger campus services, Rubin said.

Since the proposed study is in its early stages – it is still being discussed and has not yet been approved – it is not known when the study will be done.

Hillel meets in Toronto

TORONTO — Hillel, an international Jewish campus organization, held its annual lay leadership conference outside the United States for the first time ever.

The Schusterman Hillel International Lay Leadership Conference was held in Toronto from March 25 to 27.

"It was a demonstration of our commitment to Jewish life on campus in Canada," said Jeff Rubin, director of communications for Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

Last year, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto became affiliated with Hillel. Outside Toronto, Hillel provides services to affiliates in Montreal and Vancouver and to campuses with fewer than 500 Jewish students through Hillel's Soref Initiative for Emerging Campuses.

Chrétien make historic visit to Israel

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Jean Chrétien became the first Canadian prime minister to visit Israel in an official capacity when he, his wife Aline, and members of Parliament arrived at Ben-Gurion airport on April 8.

In Israel, Chrétien visited Yad Vashem and Yitzhak Rabin's grave, as well as meeting with President Ezer Weizman, Prime Minister Ehud Barak, Supreme Court President Aharon Barak and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert. He also received an honorary degree from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In addition, Chrétien met in Gaza with Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat.

Asked why Chrétien's itinerary called for him to meet a number of Israeli officials and only one Palestinian official, an adviser to the prime minister said: "The prime minister is on a 12-day trip. He'll be spending eight or nine days in Arab countries. While he's spending more time in Israel than in the …territories, most of his time will be spent in other Arab states."

He added that Canada's relationship with Israel goes back to 1948, whereas it is much newer with the Palestinian Authority.

When Jean and Aline Chrétien visited Yad Vashem Sunday morning, Dr. Robert Rozett, director of the Yad Vashem library, took them on a tour of the museum.

Stopping at the World Response Section, Rozett read out a letter from the the Evian Conference held during World War II to discuss the question of how to deal with the Jewish refugees. The Canadian delegate wrote at that time: "The trouble is that the more that is done for them [refugees], the more of them there will be…So nothing will be done by Canada."

Chrétien, who visited Auschwitz last year, was visibly disturbed by the contents of the letter.

At the end of his tour in the museum, Chrétien apologized for Canada's failure to provide a haven for Jews during the Holocaust.

"Yes, errors were made in the past," Chrétien said. "But as you know, Canada is the most open nation today for refugees all over the world."

In Yad Vashem's guest book, Chrétien further wrote: "As prime minister of Canada, I pledge to you that Canada will take a leading role to ensure that such atrocities never happen again."

Some people in the prime minister's entourage were aware of Canada's reputation as a haven for former Nazis who settled there shortly after World War II.

However, the situation in Canada has "dramatically improved from '85-'86 when Canada was in fact a [Nazi] safe haven," said Jack Silverstone, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, who was with Chrétien in Israel.

"In fairness, I don't think [the label that Canada is a Nazi haven] is true anymore," he said. "You can't say it's the same country it was…there have been substantial changes."

Canada is one of the few countries that have ongoing cases against Nazi war criminals, Silverstone added, noting that not long ago, Canada revoked the citizenship of Helmut Oberlander, an SS death squad member.

During their meeting, Barak welcomed Chrétien, saying he hopes "this visit will further relations between Canada and Israel."

One connection between the two countries is Canada's history of participation in Mideast peacekeeping missions. Canada played a central role in defusing the Suez Canal crisis in 1956 and helped introduce the modern-day concept of UN peacekeeping.Today a Canadian commands the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF) in the Golan Heights.

Chrétien told Barak that if Israel needed Canadian soldiers to guard the Lebanese border after the pullout, he would send them.

"I have come to reaffirm the commitment of Canada to do our part to assist you and your Arab neighbours as you travel this challenging road, a road whose risk and challenges are worth taking if the reward is a just, secure and lasting peace for Israel and the entire region," Chrétien said.

But Barak said such an offer was not needed: "We're grateful for Canada's role in peacekeeping," said Barak. "To the best of my understanding if we pull out in a way that will be [agreeable with the implementation of Resolution 425]… it seems to me there would be no need for more UNIFIL soldiers."

Today, 220 Canadian soldiers serve in the UN multilateral force in the Golan, and 20 in the Sinai.

After his three-day visit to Israel, Chrétien was to tour Jordan, Egypt, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Lebanon.

On Monday, Chrétien visited Gaza for his meeting with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

His staff was asked why he had not planned to meet Arafat in East Jerusalem.

"Arafat wanted to meet the prime minister in Gaza," said one adviser. "Indeed, Arafat doesn't have authority in East Jerusalem."

The "objective was to return the visit Arafat made to Canada almost a year ago," said one official. "When we established the visit, Arafat decided he wanted to meet the prime minister in Gaza. That's where his office is."

At a press conference with Canadian reporters Chrétien said: "I'll meet with Arafat where he invited me – in Gaza. So I don't see it as a political statement."

Court rules Weiz can be extradited

By VIVA PRESS
Israel CJN Bureau

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem District Court Judge Zvi Cohen ruled Monday that Daniel Weiz can be extradited to Canada to face murder charges.

Weiz has been charged with second degree murder in the November killing of 15-year-old Dimitri Baranovski in a Toronto park during a scuffle over money and a pack of cigarettes.

His lawyer, Nitzana Darshan-Leitner, said she will appeal the decision to the Supreme Court.

Weiz has admitted that he was in the park but denied kicking and stomping Baranovski to death. Weiz was in Toronto visiting his father at the time. He lives with his mother in Israel.

In his five-page decision, Cohen ruled that there is enough evidence to warrant a trial, though some of it is contradictory. Darshan-Leitner said she would appeal to the Supreme Court within 30 days. She said the basis of her appeal would be her belief that the evidence against Weiz is false. She said Weiz is being framed by the other teenagers.

State Attorney Irit Kohn said this is for the Canadian courts to decide.

Under Israel's new extradition law, an Israeli citizen can be extradited for trial abroad if there is a promise that the citizen will be returned to Israel to serve a sentence if convicted. Canada has said it will agree to send Weiz back if he is convicted, and Cohen ruled in favour of this pledge.

13 Iranian accused allowed their own counsel

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Following an appeal by Iran's chief rabbi, the Iranian judiciary has announced it will allow 13 Jews accused of spying for Israel and America to hire their own lawyers, says an American Jewish leader.

The 13 will also get a few extra days to prepare their case, according to Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Previously, the "Iran 13" – who could be sentenced to death – had been represented by lawyers appointed by the Islamic fundamentalist-controlled judiciary.

The trial had been scheduled for April 13, but now will likely be held April 18, Hoenlein said last week.

Despite the Iranian concessions, Hoenlein said, North American Jewish organizations will go ahead with a flurry of high-profile activities aimed at both highlighting the plight of the prisoners and pressuring Tehran to end the entire yearlong ordeal.

B'nai Brith Canada, for one, has requested observer status at the trial.

Canada has also publicly expressed its concerns about the fate of the Iranians.

Speaking to the policy conference last month in Ottawa of the Canada Israel Committee, Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy said "the arrest of the 13 Iranian Jews was a matter of considerable, broad-based mutual concern."

Axworthy emphasized that it was "a priority to arrive at a rapid, just resolution" of the situation. He called for an open trial of the accused to comply with international judicial standards, and subject to international observation.

Iranian officials have indicated that the trial will be a one-day affair.

If that's the case, Jewish advocates will press Iran to release the prisoners on bail, regardless of the verdict, so they can return to their homes for Passover.

A high-profile former diplomat tapped by Canadian Jewish Congress to intervene with Tehran on the fate of the 13 has said he doubts the accused will receive death sentences or life imprisonment.

Giandomenico Picco, a one-time hostage negotiator for the United Nations, also believes that a good sign is the fact that the 13 will be tried by regular courts, not Iran's Islamic revolutionary courts.

It's unclear what prompted Tehran's change of mind.

Both Israel and the United States have vehemently denied the charges against the Iranian Jews.

Until now, U.S. and Canadian advocates have pursued quiet diplomacy, marshalling support from many governments and human rights groups to release the detainees, or at least to ensure a fair trial.

But having seen little progress, the activists are now taking a more high-profile approach.

On the diplomatic front, Hoenlein said he expects the U.S. Congress to pass a bipartisan resolution that will denounce Iran for its detention of the Jews.

Governments around the world are being asked to pass similar resolutions, he added, while various leaders, including some from Arab and Muslim countries, have indicated they will step up efforts to pressure Tehran.

At the grassroots level, vigils, but not street demonstrations, are taking place at various locations in the United States and Canada.

Last Sunday, for example, Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, held a vigil on a Toronto beach.

Montreal Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler condemned the Iranian decision to prosecute the 13 Jews while also denying them the right to a fair trail in general and their right to counsel, in particular. He characterized the group as "utterly innocent of crime," saying there is no "shred of evidence" against them.

Cotler released the text of a letter that he and McGill law dean Peter Leuprecht sent to Iranian President Mohammad Khatami and to the head of the Iranian judiciary, Ayatollah Shahroudi. The letter documents the violations by the Iranian authorities of their own law, and of international treaty law to which Iran is a state party, in the course of their prosecution and persecution of the 13 Jews.

Cotler and Leuprecht condemned the arbitrary character of the arrest and detention, the lack of notice of the nature and causes of the charges, the prolonged character of the year-long incommunicado detention, the denial of communication with counsel of their choice, the absence of any publicly disclosed evidence and the absence of a trial within a reasonable period of time.

They detailed the extent of the violations as "incredible" and called on Khatami to respect the historic "Iranian civilizational heritage" and "release the Iranian Jews as part of the process of emancipation and liberty."

Rabbis across the religious spectrum agreed to recite special prayers last weekend. In Los Angeles, the Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations held a special commemoration to mark the first anniversary of the arrests.

The Jews were reportedly arrested along with eight Muslim men. But none of the 21 has been formally charged, which also violates Iranian law, said Pooya Dayanim, the council's spokesperson and himself a lawyer.

"Basically, these Jews are hostages," said Dayanim. "Iran may feel the longer it delays the trial, the less it will be internationalized and hurt them. Our job is to remind them that the world community still cares about these people."

The detainees are all community or religious leaders, most of whom come from the southern cities of Shiraz and Isfahan, except for a 16-year-old boy who is one of three now out on bail.

Their arrest was believed to be part of a political battle between Iran's hard-line revolutionaries and reformists behind Iranian President Mohammad Khatami.

American observers had hoped that the resounding victory by Iran's reformists in the Feb. 18 parliamentary elections would bode well for the prisoners.

If anything, their situation has worsened, said Hoenlein.

"All the things we'd been promised and thought would come true – just the opposite has happened."

In related developments last week, Reuters reported that the judge in the case of the 13 Iranian Jews paid a surprise visit to their prison to wish them well for the upcoming Passover holiday.

The Iranian justice ministry said revolutionary court Judge Sadeq Nourani, assigned to hear the case in the southern city of Shiraz, visited the 10 jailed accused as a humanitarian gesture.

The gesture is virtually unprecedented in the Islamic Republic and underscores the determination of the authorities to handle the case with sensitivity, after it provoked outrage in some western capitals.

The ministry distributed letters from three of the detained Jews, thanking Nourani for his visit.

Judiciary spokesperson Hossein Saddeqi told state television that eight of the accused had informed the court that they were appointing their own lawyers and the other five were expected to do so before the trial begins.

Syria hardens its demands against Israel

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper

JERUSALEM — Syria has toughened its position vis-a-vis the proposals made by President Bill Clinton in his March 26 meeting with President Hafez al-Assad, according to sources knowledgeable about the document.

Syria's reply, which addressed points made at the Geneva summit, was delivered last week via the U.S. embassy in Damascus. The sources say the Syrians have taken a "step backward" and no longer accept the compromise proposals they already had agreed to in talks with Israel.

A political source in Israel said Assad's aim is to enshrine his tough positions in written documents which will later be presented as the positions at which the negotiations with Israel were broken off – but they will also afford Syria some latitude for flexibility if and when talks resume.

The sources said Syria is demanding a total Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights to the lines of June 4, 1967, Syrian sovereignty on the shore of the Kinneret, and the right to part of the sea.

Furthermore, Damascus is adamantly opposed to an early-warning station on Mount Hermon after a withdrawal, and will begin normalization with Israel only after the evacuation of the Golan is complete.

Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara told reporters, after he met President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo last Saturday, that his country is ready to negotiate over the water issue with Israel but not over the border.

"Land is not subject to negotiation – water is," the Egyptian press quoted Shara as saying.

Sharansky visits Falash Moras in Gondar

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper

GONDAR, Ethiopia — Interior Minister Natan Sharansky travelled to famine-stricken Ethiopia Sunday on a three-day visit to assess the condition of the Falash Mora community.

About 26,000 Falash Moras – Jews who converted to Christianity about a century ago – have gathered in compounds near Gondar and Addis Ababa, pleading to be brought to Israel.

"I knew the situation was difficult, but to see the suffering close-up is a difficult experience which can leave no one unmoved," said the minister.

"We are a nation of immigrants, but we must also operate within the law and bring to Israel those eligible according to the Law of Return. I know what it means to be a refugee and not seeing my wife for 12 years," said Sharansky on the plane to Ethiopia.

The Gondar compound is a harsh place. Approximately 10,000 members of the Falash Mora have gathered there over the last two years from nearby villages. Living conditions are difficult and most are on the threshold of famine.

The majority of the Falash Mora in Gondar have families in Israel. When Sharansky visited, their representatives told him in an emotional letter in English: "We dream of Jerusalem and ask that as Moses led the people of Israel, you will bring us to Israel before the Passover."

Syrian Web sites reveal anti-Israel rhetoric

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Despite eight years of peace talks between Syria and Israel, it appears that state-controlled Syrian news agencies have done little to cool their overheated anti-Israel rhetoric.

Beyond painting Syria as an innocent victim and the Israelis as bloodthirsty aggressors, several English language Syrian Web sites have recently compared Israel to Nazi Germany. One suggested that Jews consider themselves "the superior race."

The CJN examined five English language sites: those operated by the Al-Thawra, Teshreen and al-Baath newspapers, the Web site of the Golan, and one by the Syrian Arab News Agency (SANA).

The Golan site (www.golan-syria.org/index1.htm) was the most vitriolic, employing the Nazi analogy repeatedly. In an April 5 posting that attacked an article published by the Zionist Organization of America, Golan-Syria refers to the "Super Israeli Race" (bold italics in the original). Palestinians resisting Israel are compared to "the French resistance to the Nazi occupation," and the article pointedly asks whether those who "confronted the Hitleric occupation [were] terrorists."

In another item on the Web site, titled "Zionist Propaganda is legacy of Nazi propaganda," the author suggests that "Israel has…mastered the art of political blackmail and demagogic propaganda."

Yet another item refers to "Zionism's greediness in the Golan" and it alleges Jews see themselves as "the superior race fully entitled to dominate." It concludes, "Isn't this the logic of Hitler, Nazism and fascism."

The SANA Web site (www.sana.org/English1/israeli_terrorism.htm) presents a section on "Israeli terrorism" that claims the "terrorism concept has been clearly seen in the Zionist movement blood, mentality and even in their writings. It was in their general notion on the way to fulfill the movement sinister aims" (sic).

Compares Israel to Nazi-Germany

A second article claims Israel "encouraged drug smuggling to Egypt and flooded its markets with counterfeit currencies and rotten food. It is Israel that secretly passed to Egypt mail stamps that were painted with heroin on its sticky side."

The Stern Gang, a 1940s Israeli paramilitary organization, allegedly tried to assassinate British General Bernard Law Montgomery and "also made another assassination bid against last U.S. President Harry Truman. It was because fanatic Zionists had felt that he did not give enough support to their claims in Palestine."

The article later quotes British writer Aldous Huxley, saying that "Zionism hands are behind rotten germs injected in the human civilization body all over the world" (sic).

The Syria Times Web site (www.teshreen.com/web/apolitic-s009.htm) alleges Israelis "never kept their word or promise" and that "it seems Israel cannot change its expansionist and aggressive nature."

The Teshreen site, which includes reports from the Syria Times, as well as the al-Baath and al-Thawra sites, places sole responsibility for the absence of a peace accord on the Israeli side.

Al-Thawra (www.thawra.com/report/force.html) is fawning in its praise of Syrian president Hafez al-Assad, but did not, in the articles viewed by The CJN, employ the Nazi analogy against Israel.

Meanwhile, a recent analysis piece on the Palestine Times Web site (www.ptimes.com) makes use of the Nazi analogy in the context of the Pope John Paul II's recent visit to Israel's Yad Vashem Memorial. Writer Erik Paul states: "The Pope publicly mourned the allegedly millions of Jews killed during the Holocaust…That million of Jews were killed during the Holocaust is also debatable." The article goes on to paint Israelis as bloodthirsty killers, and it claims that Israel's Shin Bet domestic intelligence agency "puts Hitler's SS to shame."

The level of vitriol in state-controlled Arab media does not surprise David Goldberg, director of research and education for the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

"Most of the most virulent anti-Israel and anti-Semitic rhetoric comes from Syria," he said. "It's officially sanctioned government propaganda."

Other Arab states also sanction anti-Semitic materials, he continued. "There are elements of anti-Semitism in Arab newspapers, especially in Egypt, which is most perplexing and disturbing for Israel to see."

Goldberg suggested there may be cool political calculations behind the heated rhetoric. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak may be attempting "to toe the line in the Arab world and have a peace with Israel," he said. "That may be why it gets into the official Egyptian press."

A similar logic may be operating in Syria, he continued. Assad is concerned about improving relations with the United States as well as with Israel, while at the same time "sustaining his own regime and maintaining his status in the Arab camp."

As with Mubarak, permitting anti-Israel and anti-Semitic propaganda may help establish his bona fides in the Arab world, Goldberg suggested.

Goldberg believes this could backfire when it comes time to complete a deal with Israel. Support in Israel for a peace deal with Syria is at best a 50-50 proposition, he said. What is needed is "for Assad to demonstrate good faith to Israel. One confidence-building measure would be an end to anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist rhetoric. That would go a long way to show he's serious."

Spokespersons for the Syrian Embassy were unavailable for comment.

'If we don't maintain our culture, we will die'

Commentary

Natalia Lvona Itelson, 34, worked for almost three years as the leader of a volunteer group organizing a new Jewish community welfare and cultural organization in Vladimir, Russia, (1,500 Jews), beginning in late 1996.

They developed a welfare program that provided food parcels and clothing, a Sunday school for some 30 children, a theatre group, a music ensemble, a family club and a youth club.

Early in 1999, the organization adopted the name Hesed Lev and appointed Itelson as executive director at a nominal salary.

Hesed Lev in Vladimir (180 kilometres east of Moscow) is part of a network of chesed groups initiated by the JDC (the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee) in 111 communities in Russia and other countries in the former Soviet Union since the early '90s.

JDC provides the food for the Hesed Lev welfare program, including Jewish holiday parcels to 250 of a total of 400 pensioners, monthly parcels to 150 people, and one meal a day to 20 people five days a week.

A three-storey building recently purchased in the centre of town is being renovated to serve as a "Jewish house" in Vladimir. The Russian Jewish Congress provided close to half of the $20,000 (US) purchase price of the building, with most of the balance coming from individual donors. The cost of repairs and renovations is estimated at $53,000, a substantial portion of which has been promised by the JDC.

Natalia Itelson, director of Hesed Lev, with the exhibit of Jewish-government relations documents.

In the midst of Hesed Lev's growing programs, and facing a funding shortfall, Itelson heard of the Canadian Executive Service Organization (CESO), which sends volunteer advisors (usually retired professionals) all over the world to advise and help government and non-government organizations to improve their operations. (Several CESO volunteer advisors had already been to Vladimir.) She decided to ask CESO for help with new sources of funding and overseas contacts.

This was the first time a Jewish organization had requested help from CESCO, which is funded largely by the Canadian International Development Agency (CEDA) and is thus part of Canada's international aid program.

As a retired Jewish professional, I was asked to undertake the assignment; I agreed do so, even though it meant travelling to Russia in the early winter. I was there for 3½ weeks, accompanied and assisted by my wife, Bertha.

Some Jews have left Vladimir for Israel and other countries since the doors from the former U.S.S.R. were opened. But many of those who remain wish to rebuild life and renew Jewish culture. I got this message, not only by witnessing the activities, but at a special meeting with the board of directors of Hesed Lev. Five out of seven board members attended the meeting along with the executive director.

They told me that in addition to helping the needy, their first priority is to revive Jewish culture.

"Russian Jews are living the same life as all the Russian people," said Natan Chatevich, the chairman of the board. "But if we don't maintain our culture, we will die."

Yuri Tumarkin, another board member who is director of the House of Art Workers in Vladimir, said that in Russian cultural circles, there are some people who believe that Jewish artists and musicians are destructive to Russian culture.

"We want to develop Jewish culture to interact positively with Russian culture," he said. "We believe the 'Jewish house' should not only provide welfare, but also help to raise young Jews to know their culture and thus protect themselves against anti-Semitic views."

The board members spoke of anti-Semitic demonstrations in Russia, of an anti-Semitic organization in Vladimir and other towns, of swastikas appearing in some homes, and other incidents.

Some time ago, a Jewish cemetery was vandalized. An investigation was held, but nothing was done. The regional government does not intervene against anti-Semitism.

However, the board members did not say anti-Semitism is causing Jews to leave the country. Instead, one said, "By buying our house we will protect our people."

Tumarkin added, "In Russia everything is done on an emotional level and on the basis of instinct. We hope the 'Jewish house' will be the 'Golden Middle.'"

They said they have support in the larger community, mainly in cultural and scientific circles. Evidence of this is to be seen in the fact that some non-Jews have given aid to Hesed Lev. We in fact met a deputy mayor and another civic official, both non-Jews, who are very supportive.

The board members asked me, "Why do you want to help us?"

I explained the role of CESCO in sending volunteer advisors around the world as part of Canada's international aid program. I also told them about the Jewish federation system in Canada and the United States.

Asked about my strategic goals in undertaking this assignment, I said that one of them is to tell the story of the Jews rebuilding Jewish life in Russia as Hesed Lev is doing in Vladimir, in spite of the fact that many Jews have left the country.

Other Hesed Lev board members who participated in the discussion were Victor Efros, director of technical services; Janna Yoffe, director of the Vladimir Cultural Centre; and Grigory Abramovich, representing his brother Josef Abramovich, who is a leading sponsor of Hesed Lev and head of the Vladimir branch of the Russian Jewish Congress.

The writer was in Russia in late 1999. He was sent there by the Canadian Executive Service Organization to advise Hesed Lev.

Some of the younger children at the Hesed Lev Sunday School in Vladimir, with their teacher Alexei Zuyev, display a Chanukah poster in Russian.

Pain relief techniques urged for circumcisions

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People should encourage mohelim to use pain relief techniques when they perform a circumcision, says Rabbi Moshe Dovid Tendler.

Pain is usually considered in Jewish thought to be "a sign that God is talking to us," either saying that we are doing something wrong, or that we are not living up to our potential, Rabbi Tendler said.

"That does not apply to a baby. An eight-day-old doesn't learn anything from pain. Besides, it's a special mitzvah to avoid pain for a child."

Rabbi Tendler, professor and chair of biology at Yeshiva College, professor of medical ethics at Yeshiva University and a rosh yeshiva at RIETS, the theological seminary of Yeshiva University, was speaking at a public lecture on brit milah at Shaarei Shomayim.

The program, called Ritual Circumcision in the New Millennium: the Cutting Edge, was sponsored by Shaarei Shomayim adult education committee and the Association of Mohelim of Southern Ontario.

The other speaker was author and speaker Rabbi Paysach Krohn, himself a mohel.

Dr. Aaron Jesin, a family practitioner and mohel, told The CJN in a telephone interview after the program that pain relief is considered appropriate by many mohelim, who use creams and Tylenol.

In fact, he said, a mohel in the United States has been using a lidocaine-based cream that has been very effective, and he will be sending some to Toronto for testing here.

There is still a controversy about the use of injected pain relief, said Jesin, because there is a feeling that the pain of the injection will be worse than the pain of the brit.

Rabbi Tendler said that even when thinking about a mitzvah of the importance of brit milah, the health concerns of the mohel are taken into consideration.

"For instance, the New England Journal of Medicine advised using circumcision guards [devices that protect the person performing the circumcision] as a protection against HIV," the virus that causes AIDS.

Rabbi Krohn said brit milah is "one of those rare mitzvot that bonds all Jews together. It is always associated with joy."

It represents a commitment to both Jewish generations of the past, and those of the future, he said.

The brit milah symbolizes a new beginning, he said, citing as examples that Joshua was told to ensure that the Israelites were circumcised before they entered the land of Israel, a mitzvah that had not been observed during the years of wandering in the desert for fear of infection; and that Abraham was told he would be the father of the Jewish nation only after he circumcised himself.

This covenant between God and the Jewish people is marked by a cutting, a separation, Rabbi Krohn said, because "we have chosen to be different from the rest of the world. That's the pride of the brit."

Rabbi Krohn also emphasized the importance of performing the brit on the mandated eighth day. That number symbolizes many things, the eight days of Chanukah, the eight tzitzit, the earliest time that a child can experience the spiritual injection of Friday turning into the holiness of Shabbat.

Just as Abraham was "the first kiruv professional," a person who brings Jews closer to the Jewish experience, the brit should be an opportunity to bring Jews closer together, he said.

"Take the time to explain what is going on," he advised, "especially if it is a non-religious group."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am having a debate with my roommate about where to store tomatoes. I think they are supposed to go in the fridge; she says they belong at room temperature, on the counter. What is the best answer?

A. Your roommate is right on this one. Tomatoes should be stored at room temperature to retain optimal flavour and texture.

Q. It is true that yogurt contains more calcium than milk?

A. Yes most soft yogurt, cup for cup, actually contains more calcium than milk.

Q. I am sensitive to MSG. Are their other ingredients that I should avoid?

A. You will also want to avoid hydrolyzed vegetable protein and hydrolyzed plant protein, as they may cause the same symptoms as Monosodium Glutamate (MSG).

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist, specializing in pediatric and adult nutrition in Toronto. If you have any nutrition questions, send them to The CJN.

Blood test for early Alzheimer's on the horizon

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A simple blood test to detect Alzheimer's disease in its early stages has been developed by researchers at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH), but it will be at least a year before it is available to the public.

Older people with mild memory loss could know years in advance whether they will have full-blown Alzheimer's disease or are just experiencing the "benign" forgetfulness associated with aging, with this test, members of the research team say.

Dr. Hyman Schipper, director of the neuroscience laboratory at the JGH's Lady Davis Institute, announced that he discovered that the protein heme oxygenase-1 (HO-1) is a biological marker for sporadic Alzheimer's, the most common form of the disease. Fewer than 10 percent of people with this form of the disease have familial Alzheimer's, for which a genetic test is already available.

"This blood test is a very significant milestone in the diagnosis and management of Alzheimer's disease," he said.

While there is no cure or therapy to effectively slow down the disease today, Schipper said the blood test will be an answer for the "huge" number of people over 60 who are worried about their memory.

> Will help patients plan next three to five years of their lives

Knowing they have early Alzheimer's, will enable them to plan the next three to five years of their life, the window they may have before becoming incapacitated, he said. This time could be used to get financial affairs in order, arrange family counselling or just take a trip

The test will also be important in ruling out Alzheimer's If doctors know a patient does not have the disease, they will not prescribe drugs such as Arisept, which can be used to alleviate the symptoms of Alzheimer's.

Depression in the elderly, for example, can look like Alzheimer's, but its treatment is different, Schipper said

As experimental drugs are developed for Alzheimer's, the blood test will make it easier to recruit appropriate subjects for clinical trials, he added.

It is not the presence, but rather the lack of HO-1 in the blood that indicates Alzheimer's, Schipper said.

A few years ago, the researchers found out through autopsies that HO-1 levels are high in the brains of Alzheimer's sufferers and actually are part of the plaques and neurofibrillary tangles that are characteristic of the disease, he said.

They were surprised to find that HO-1 was not also high in the blood of people with Alzheimer's and, in fact, the opposite was true. Healthy people, whether young or elderly, had much more HO-1 in their blood than those with Alzheimer's.

The researchers also found that people with age-associated cognitive decline (AACD), that is, with some memory loss but not to the extent of Alzheimer's, have HO-1 levels midway between those of the normal control group and those of the Alzheimer's patients. About half of those with AACD will go on to develop Alzheimer's within three to five years, Schipper said, and there is currently no way to diagnose who will be among that 50 percent.

The HO-1 levels in Alzheimer's patients were also lower than in those with non-Alzheimer dementia, non-dementing neurological illnesses like Parkinson's, and chronic medical conditions such as depression, whose symptoms may mimic dementia.

The test is accurate in detecting early Alzheimer's 88 percent of the time, Schipper said.

HO-1 is an enzyme that plays a role in the metabolism of iron.

At present, Schipper said, doctors do not have proof of Alzheimer's until a post-mortem confirms that is, indeed, what the patient had.

In the early stages of the disease, doctors can make a fairly sure diagnosis through a lengthy series of interviews and tests that rule out other causes of the symptoms.

At the JGH's memory clinic, a forgetful older person typically will be interviewed by a doctor for between 60 and 90 minutes, undergo neuro-psychological testing for three to six hours, have a battery of blood tests taken and possibly be given a CAT or MRI scan.

The total cost per patient is around $3,000, he said, while the new H0-1 test would cost "in the hundreds" and is quick and simple enough to be suitable for mass screenings.

The JGH team, in collaboration with other researchers, will spend the next year or more in experiments involving at least 1,000 more people, both with Alzheimer's and from control groups.

Schipper said it was premature to speculate on whether this increased knowledge of the role of HO-1 could lead to a new treatment for Alzheimer's.

"Our view is that HO-1 is deleterious to the brain, and absence in the blood of those with Alzheimer's indicates that the body is trying to rid itself of an excess. A hypothesis is that, if HO-1 could be blocked, it may be salutary."

The JGH team has spent more than three years on this project, which is being funded by the Medical Research Council, the Fonds de Recherches Scientifiques du Québec and the American Alzheimer Association.

Film documents March Of The Living

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

"As soon as you listen to a witness, you're a witness too." With these words, survivor Judy Cohen introduces a group of Toronto teenagers to what will probably be one of the most emotional experiences of their lives.

The Toronto youths form a group of 7,000 teenagers from around the world that embark on the annual March of the Living.

The documentary Each Of Us Has A Name, captures the Toronto contingent's emotions and experiences as they travel to the bleakest spots on earth – the concentration and death camps in Poland.

The group with guides Cohen and two other survivors, Max Eisen and Nate Leipciger, travel to Treblinka, Majdanek and Auschwitz/Birkenau. At the end of each day, the group holds a debriefing session where the teens are invited to air their thoughts.

Some of the teens display signs of obvious anti-Polish sentiment. With this in mind, the Toronto author wins Hadassah prize

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto writer Richard Teleky has won a prestigious literary prize — the Harold Ribalow Award for the Best Novel of the Year on a Jewish Theme — for his first novel, The Paris Years of Rosie Kamin.

The award, which includes a $1,000 cheque, is administered by the American Jewish organization Hadassah-WIZO. The organization published a chapter of the book in its magazine Hadassah in January. Previous winners have included Anne Michaels, Anne Roiphe and Philip Roth.

Roiphe praised Teleky for writing "cross-gender without a false note," and described the novel as "an extraordinary act of empathy." She characterized it as a work of low realism which possesses one fabulous-surrealistic occurrence that transforms it into a fable.

Teleky teaches creative writing at York University and is a fellow at York's Centre for Jewish Studies. "It was a surprise to Hadassah to learn that I'm not Jewish," says the Cleveland-born writer who came here in the late 1960s.

"I've always lived my life since childhood in a Jewish milieu," he says. "My very first friend in elementary school had parents who were concentration camp survivors. My first piano teacher escaped a concentration camp.

"That pattern has gone on my entire life. It's not that I seek people out, I just keep meeting them. It's very natural for me to write about people from that world."

Rosie Kamin, the novel's title character, is an American Jew living in Paris whose mother, a survivor of the Holocaust, had committed suicide. When Rosie's Arab lover unexpectedly dies, her repressed feelings around the much-earlier loss of her mother resurface, and she is forced to deal with them.

Rosie and her coterie of immigrant friends are outsiders in Paris, just as her parents' generation, being Jews, were outcasts in European society. She and her sister, Deb, who visits from America, are portrayed as sad but sympathetic eccentrics. Together they visit Budapest in search of a belated understanding of their mother's past.

Teleky paints Paris from the perspective of an immigrant, an outsider living on the fringes of society. "I've always been attracted to outsider figures, people who are labeled as marginal, because the energy of any culture is in the outsider," he says.

The child of one Protestant and one Catholic parent, he says he did not have to struggle to write convincingly about a Jewish character, just as he found he could credibly write a book in which a woman is the central character.

"We've made political correctness such an issue, and I think it's a false one," he says. "Because from the start I wasn't going to pass myself off as anything but what I was. In a way I didn't choose the subject, the subject chose me. I was conscious of that throughout the book."

HOLY BLOSSOM OFFERS PASSOVER CONCERT

The music of Toronto composer Srul Irving Glick is being featured in Music for Passover, a gala concert featuring the Beth Tikvah Choir, the Holy Blossom Temple Singers and the Lachan Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir. Also featured are guest artists from the Toronto Symphony Orchestra – harpist Judy Loman, and the Festival String Quartet, led by TSO associate concert master Mark Skazinetsky.

Proceeds to benefit the Reena Foundation and Homes for Adults with Autism and PDD (HAADD), which both support persons with developmental disabilities. Adults $15, seniors and students $10; tickets available at the door or through Reena at 905-763-8254, ext. 3034.

Holy Blossom Temple, 1050 Bathurst St., Toronto. April 23, 7:30 p.m.

Warsaw Ghetto Remembrance: The United Jewish People's Order and the Morris Winchevsky School commemorate the 57th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and Jewish resistance during the Holocaust.

The program includes Anita Ekstein, who will talk about her experience as a hidden child during the Holocaust, a performance of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, Yiddish readings, dramatic readings by members of the Winchevsky Youth Division, and a candle-lighting ceremony.

Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. Admission free. April 16, 7:30 p.m.

Book News: The Jewish Book Council presented its National Jewish Book Award in Jewish Thought to Yeshiva University president Norman Lamm in March for his work, The Religious Thought of Hasidism (KTAV Publishing), which provides a monumental history of the early chassidic movement.

At the same ceremony, Herman Wouk received a Distinguished Literary Achievement Award for such works as Marjorie Morningstar, The Winds of War and The Caine Mutiny, for which he won a Pulitzer Prize in 1952.

In the Spotlight: Dr. Edmund Yehuda Lipsitz, a Hebrew day-school principal in Kitchener-Waterloo and a former executive of the Canadian Jewish Congress, recently endured his proverbial 15 minutes of fame after Mordecai Richler penned a bitingly satirical column about him in the April Fool's Day edition of the National Post.

And much to his credit, Lipsitz braved it with a smile. "Who would have thought I would ever have gotten such media attention?" he laughed, incredulously.

Lipsitz is editor of Who's Who in Canadian Jewry, the recent third edition of which features succinct biographical entries for hundreds of prominent Canadian Jews. Richler noted that his famed fictional character Duddy Kravitz once published a similar book and made money by selling multiple copies to the people listed in the book.

Richler poked all sorts of fun at the sociological essays included in Lipsitz's Who's Who, which he characterized as an honour roll of community volunteers: "They seem to take turns at being designated Man or Woman of the Year and many have won a Samuel Bronfman medal for something or other."

He also noted that many people, including himself, prefer not to be listed in such a catalogue for fear of becoming easy prey to UJA fund-raisers: "Word gets out that I'm a Jew, and I'm done for."

Despite such irresistible jibes, Who's Who in Canadian Jewry is a noteworthy publication and certainly not the first of its kind. One notable antecedent is the 1933 compendium Canadian Jewry: Prominent Jews of Canada, edited by Dr. Zvi Cohen. Boasting some 800 entries, this rare volume is worth its weight in gold to historians and genealogists.

Who's Who in Canadian Jewry is available from JESL Educational Products, P.O. Box 1183, Postal Stn. B, Downsview, Ont., M3H 5V6.

To Dr. Lipsitz: May the next edition be bigger and better than ever!

March Of The Living an emotional journey

organizers set up a dialogue with a group of Polish students whereby the two groups can freely discuss issues.

When one March member asks a Polish counterpart what Polish teens do for fun, the Pole replies: "Well in Poland we have very good vodka." This elicits laughter and applause and the heavy cloud of animosity seems to dissipate.

The trip to the crematoriums and the Dome of Ashes is almost too much for some of the teens who can't contain their emotions. The March culminates in the traditional three kilometre-march from Auschwitz to Birkenau where the teens walk proudly on the very steps their ancestors perished.

Each Of Us Has A Name airs on Global, April 17 (10 p.m. in Ontario, Vancouver and Quebec; 9 p.m. in Winnipeg, Regina and Saskatoon; 8 p.m. Atlantic time).

Author wins American Hadassah-WIZO award

He describes the book as a type of short novel known in German as a conte – longer than a novella, and usually organized around the consciousness of one character.

"It's not ironic, it's very human. Isaac Bashevis Singer is the closest example I can think of in America. It's a very European sensibility."

Teleky has already finished a second novel and is at work on a third. Previously a fiction editor for the Oxford University Press in Canada, he saw into print Canadian Jewish Short Stories, a well-known anthology edited by Miriam Waddington, in 1990. He is also the author of Hungarian Rhapsodies, a book of essays on Hungarian culture.

Exploring the uniqueness of the Galapagos Islands

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

GALAPAGOS — As I arrived by motorized Zodiac onto the shores of Punta Suarez in Galapagos' most south-eastern island of Española, I gingerly stepped across some boulders to a pathway.

There I stood in awe of the beautiful flora and unique wildlife before me. Suddenly, I felt a warm wet sensation followed by a tickle on my ankle, and discovered a baby sea lion trying to get acquainted by rubbing me with his nose and whiskers.

My friendly sea lion, was just one of the many intriguing animals I came across during my Lindblad Special Expeditions sojourn to the archipelago of the Galapagos, located 970 kilometres off the coast of Ecuador.

The only way to truly explore the mostly uninhabited islands is by sea. After a night's rest in Ecuador's largest city, Guayaquil, we flew to the Galapagos and boarded the comfortable 80 passenger, MS Polaris.

Ironically, I can't think of a better place on earth to see God's creation than in the place where, in 1835, Charles Darwin shaped evolutionary science. The islands inspired his belief of natural selection and survival of the fittest.

A marine iguana in Galapagos.

Days of discovery started early to avoid the heat of the noonday sun. We would anchor and under the watchful eye of our expedition leader and five naturalists, disembark for a guided hike, walk or Zodiac ride, depending on your energy that day.

Every complimentary excursion brought new experiences. Be it swimming with California sea lions at Española's Gardner Bay, visiting Floreana Island's Post Office Barrel to swap mail as whalers did in times gone by, drift snorkelling around Devil's Crown, enjoying the sea world from Polaris' glass bottom boat or climbing the 372 wooden steps the Galapagos National Park Service constructed – rewarding climbers with a panoramic view of the volcanic islet of Bartolomé.

Other highlights included Captain Fausto Hinojosa's tricky manoeuvring of the Polaris, in and out of the narrow, shallow underwater channel into a huge submerged caldera on an ancient dormant volcano in Darwin's Bay at Tower Island, and walking amongst the penguins on top of black slabs of lava on Fernandina Island.

Throughout the week there were a multitude of animal sightings including manta rays, golden cownose rays, dolphins, whales, hammerhead sharks, land and sea iguanas, sea turtles, Sally Lightfoot crabs, frigatebirds, Floreana mocking birds, masked boobies, albino boobies, red-footed boobies and dive bombing blue-footed boobies in search of prey.

The animals of the Galapagos have never learned fear. Our only encounter with civilization happened mid-week when the ship anchored in Santa Cruz.

The morning began with a visit to the Charles Darwin Research Station where a number of species of giant tortoises are bred for eventual return to their natural environment. At the station we met Lonesome George, the last tortoise of his kind, who refused the advances of the lovely Georginas brought forth for mating.

The afternoon was spent in the highlands visiting a pair of huge pit craters called Los Gemelos. On the way down to the lowlands, the buses stopped at a farm situated in the middle of a tortoise migratory route.

Back on board, the evening was capped off with a colourful folkloric show performed by local entertainers. Surprisingly, with no television or radio to keep us entertained, the week just flew by. The ship has a small library with books on the area.

The onboard staff conducted lectures and showed videos on the Galapagos, so even the most urbanite traveller can appreciate the surroundings.

The ship actually crossed the equator six times during the week. So one minute we were in summer and the next in winter. Passengers were invited to visit the bridge at any time to chat with the captain and his crew.

The bridge was a favourite of shutterbugs hoping to capture the Galapagos' rugged terrain, sandy beaches, crystal waters and every animal that showed its head, fins or feathers.

Since 1967, Lindblad Special Expeditions have been at the forefront in operating eco tours to Galapagos. Polaris passengers are offered the free services of a doctor on board to administer to health needs from sunburns to swollen ankles. All cabins and suites are air-conditioned and come with a shower, hair dryer and soothing piped in music. Adapters, snorkel equipment and binoculars are provided if needed.

The 10-day all-inclusive trip including eight days on ship and two nights at the Hilton Colon in Quayaquil, Ecuador costs from $2,980 to $5,140 US plus airfare.

Lindblad Special Expeditions can arrange round trip airfare to Miami for an additional charge. For more information call 1-800-EXPEDITION (1-800-397-3348) or online at: www.expeditions.com.

Village of Idiots: Chelm special

If you've ever burned your last match just to make sure it works, you may just be a Chelmnik.

The legendary villagers of Chelm have a genius for illogic and a talent for absurdity – and they will use this to fight the Czarist Russian army as it launches a pogrom against them.

John Lazarus has based this six-part radio series on his play Village of Idiots, inspired by this mythical village of Jewish folklore.

Village of Idiots airs on Richardson's Roundup weekday afternoons on April 17, 24 and May 1, 8, 15, 22 at 3:30 p.m. on CBC Radio One.

Film a quest for spirituality

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto filmmaker Jonathan Perlman has been on a spiritual journey for years now.

As a high school student, he studied Kabbalah. At university, he majored in philosophy. And in Searching for God's Echo, which has its North American premiere on TVOntario April 17 at 10 p.m. Perlman continues his deeply felt quest.

Jonathan Perlman in Israel.

A search for inspiration and passion rooted in ancient Jewish prayers and practices, Perlman's journey takes him far afield, from a Saturday morning service in a Reform synagogue in California to a chassidic wedding in Jerusalem.

Perlman, who says he has sought a spiritual home all his adult life, begins his odyssey in a north Toronto park where Torah scrolls are exchanged in a wedding.

Then, in Los Angeles, he attends a service at Congregation Ohr HaTorah, where traditional prayers are infused with a singular passion. He meets the rabbi, a red-haired ex-marine who possesses a gift of camaraderie and friendship.

Back in Toronto, Perlman interviews Perle Besserman, the author of a number of books on Jewish mysticism.

He also crosses the path of Arthur Green, a Brandeis University professor of Jewish mysticism. Green, having experienced a crisis of faith when he was 18, shares many of Perlman's views of spirituality.

In rapid succession, Perlman witnesses a series of chassidic events, a Torah dedication ceremony and a Chanukah gathering.

Subsequently, he speaks with novelist Elie Wiesel, one of his teachers at Brandeis, about the origin of faith.

In Los Angeles, Perlman sits in on a Jewish meditation conference where chanting is a pathway to spirituality.

Returning to Israel, he travels to Safed, visiting the grave of Rabbi Isaac Luria – a famous kabbalist – and dropping in at an art gallery whose owner specializes in paintings with kabbalistic themes.

In Mea Shearim, he joins yeshivah students dancing in the streets, and elsewhere in Israel, he turns up at a wedding with distinct hippy overtones.

Toward the close of the film, Perlman visits an unusual Conservative shul in Manhattan's Upper West Side where services culminate in joyous dancing.

He interviews the rabbi, Marshall Meyer, who speaks of an "inner flame" which animates his congregants.

Perlman seems to have found a kindred soul in Rabbi Meyer whose understanding of spirituality is more than skin-deep.

Israeli juniors come up short once again

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If it isn't one thing, it's usually another.

Every time the gurus behind the Israeli hockey program plug one hole, another one seems to pop up.

Last year in Bulgaria, suspect goaltending cost Israel a chance at a medal at the European Under 18 Championships, Division II. This year, the Israeli coaches and managers found themselves a credible puck stopper but were stymied from the medal round by a referee's missed call of an Israeli goal.

Instead of competing for one of the top three spots, the juniors settled for fifth. Croatia won the gold medal. The Netherlands finished second and Yugoslavia was third.

Israel started the tournament with high hopes and the confidence that they are now capable of competing for a medal, said Jeff Budd, the Kitchener volunteer who managed the team. Budd, who worked for several years at the Canada Centre ice rink in Metulla, accompanied four Canadian youngsters and one American to the tournament in Sofia, Bulgaria. The North American skaters all possess Israeli passports, he said.

"The Canadians are always important," Budd explained. "They have the toughness to play in a tournament and they bring spirit to the locker room."

The tournament involved a host of bottom tier hockey countries, including Iceland, Luxembourg, Bulgaria, Belgium, South Africa, as well as Israel, Croatia, Yugoslavia and the Netherlands. Overall, the calibre of play was comparable to Canadian triple-A hockey, Budd said.

The nine teams were divided into three groups of three, with each group playing a round robin series. Top finishers in each grouping advanced to the medal round. The second place teams moved on to a consolation round while the last place teams played each other to avoid relegation and the need to requalify.

Israel was grouped with Yugoslavia – a former Division II champion – and Iceland, one of the tournament's weak sisters. Israel and Yugoslavia both expected they'd crush the Icelanders, making the opening game against each other crucial. Unfortunately, it took the Israelis two periods to warm up by which time they trailed 6-3 and were in a deep hole.

Matters got even worse when they were assessed two minor penalties at the end of the second period. The boys in blue started the third period two men short and the Yugoslavs capitalized, going ahead 7-3.

By this time, many of the spectators had left their seats and were milling around the arena concourse. They didn't see the near miracle that unfolded next. Led by their captain, Matan Nemenoff, the Israelis whittled away at the Yugo's lead. They narrowed the margin to 7-6 and created a buzz of excitement in the arena. Fans began heading back to their seats to see what was going on, Budd said.

With about five minutes to go, the Israelis got to experience all the highs and lows that sport has to offer. They appeared to tie the score, as the puck trickled over the goal line before being swooped out by the Yugoslav netminder. "Most people could see it go in," Budd said, "but the ref didn't see it so it was no goal."

Daniel Bochner, a 15-year-old defenceman who plays for the GTHL Willowdale Blackhawks, said "everybody saw the puck go in," except the ref. "He was at the blue line" but nevertheless overturned the goal judge's call, he said.

The action was hot and heavy as Belgium (dark jerseys) pressed for a goal.

Deprived of the tying score, Israel sagged and Yugoslavia notched a late insurance marker to win 8-6.

"In our minds we tied it and for the ref to say no goal, that was tough to swallow," Budd said.

Three years ago, the Yugoslavs hammered Israel 15-2, so Budd took solace from the team's improvement. Bochner, who played on last year's junior contingent, believes the 2000 edition is "much better overall than the team last year. We strengthened our D, but overall it's a much better team." The Israelis are getting better every year, he added.

Despite the heartbreaking loss against Yugoslavia, they managed to regroup against Iceland. The North Atlantic skaters jumped into a 1-0 lead but buoyed by good goaltending from Montrealer Joey Zukran, Israel battled to a 4-2 win and second place in their grouping.

Daniel Bochner is hooked by a Bulgarian opponent.

In the consolation round, Israel faced Belgium and Bulgaria. Against Belgium, the Israelis found yet another way to lose as they squandered a 3-2 third period lead. First they allowed the tying goal. Then, with 20 seconds left in the game, the Israeli defence committed a cardinal error. They allowed a breakaway. In the last minute of a game! Four-three Belgium. They added an empty net goal. Final score, 5-3 Belgium.

Israel beat Bulgaria 7-4 in its last game and finished the tournament with a 2-2 record.

In addition to Bochner, who plays for the Willowdale Blackhawks in the Greater Toronto Hockey League, Montrealers Zukran, Itzik Levy, and David Finkelstein along with Asher Moyal of New York City bolstered the Israeli lineup. The Canadians brought with them a couple of dozen sticks donated by the Calgary Flames, thanks to the efforts of Flame forward Steve Dubinsky, who was a guest instructor at the Roger Neilson Hockey Camp in Metulla last summer.

The Israelis were coached by Simeon Yakubovitch, a former assistant coach with the Soviet Wings.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

אנן מלגו, מאת: גיא עד

Pastry:
1/4 lb. butter, softened
1/2 cup sugar
2 eggs
3/4 cup cake meal
2 tsp. potato starch

Filling: 1 lb. dry cotage cheese
1/2 cup sour cream
1 tblsp. lemon juice plus 1 tblsp. sugar
fresh strawberries, sour cream or yogurt (optional)

Cream butter and sugar. In separate bowl, mix eggs, potato starch and cake meal, then add to butter/sugar mixture. Combine all ingredients and spread half of batter onto bottom of 9"x9" greased baking dish.

Combine all cheese pie filling ingredients and pour over dough; spread evenly. Place reserved half of batter on top, in a crisscross pattern if desired. Bake in pre-heated 350°F. oven for 1 hour. Serve with strawberries and sour cream or yogurt.

Sherry Cantar (Toronto) writes: "This granola is excellent as a cereal, with yogurt or just for snacking."

SHERRY CANTAR'S PASSOVER GRANOLA

4 cups farfel
1/4 cup coconut
1/4 cup nuts (e.g. whole almonds)
1/4 cup oil
1/2 cup honey
1/4 tsp. salt
1 1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 1/2 cups raisins or chopped fruit (e.g. mixture of raisins & chopped apricots)

Preheat oven to 350. Combine farfel, coconut and nuts in a large bowl. Spread onto a non-stick cookie sheet. Bake 20 minutes, tossing several times. Meanwhile, in a saucepan combine oil, honey and salt.

Simmer, stirring constantly, until golden. Add farfel mixture. Stir until coated evenly. Add cinnamon. Spread on cookie sheet. Bake 20 minutes, stirring frequently, until brown. Remove and cool. Add fruit.

Break up any large chunks. Store in an air tight container and refrigerate. Makes about 6 cups.

Lori Schankerman (Indianapolis) and Natalie Frankel (Milwaukee) shared a similar recipe which I've combined. Lori's original recipe used soda crackers, which she replaced with matzahs! Natalie says: "Use kitchen shears and cut with the lines, then across, to make squares."

MATZAH HEALTH BARS/ MATZAH CARAMEL PECAN SQUARES

Matzahs to cover a 9 x 13 inch baking pan or 10 x 15 cookie sheet with sides
1 cup butter
1 cup brown sugar
12 oz. pkg. (2 cups) chocolate chips
1/2 to 1 cup pecan pieces
1 cup slivered almonds, optional

Generously spray aluminum foil; place in pan. Place matzahs in a single layer, breaking pieces to fit. Melt butter in saucepan. Stir in brown sugar and pecans; bring to a boil. Reduce heat to medium. Boil 2-3 minutes longer, stirring constantly. Gently pour mixture over matzahs.

Bake 7-8 minutes at 350. Remove from oven; immediately sprinkle with chocolate chips. Spread melted chocolate evenly with a spatula, making a swirled pattern. Sprinkle with almonds; cool 10-20 minutes. Cut into squares.

Place on waxed paper to cool (otherwise they'll stick). Refrigerate until set. Store in airtight container. Freezes well.

SOULFUL SEDER COMPANION • WHO NEEDS ORGANIZED RELIGION?

His piercing blue eyes seemed to be gazing at a place beyond time. The eyes that had witnessed the devastation of the Holocaust and envisioned an unprecedented Jewish reawakening were suddenly filled with tears. I was in the presence of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, at a Farbrengen.

His innocent cry was that of a child and his tears were full of compassion. "How long can a father hide and expect his child to continue seeking?" The Rebbe was crying about our exile; G-d is hiding while we His children are desperately seeking.

EDITORIAL

By Chaim Cunin

The Rebbe's message of goodness and kindness lives in his compassion for the disconnected child. His global reach thrives in the efforts of his personal emissaries worldwide. It is revealed in his books and letters, and it lives in the pages of this publication, Farbrengen magazine.

In 1957, with Passover approaching, the Rebbe wrote a letter to his emissaries that would set the tone for the spiritual revolution that followed. To honor the fiftieth anniversary of the Rebbe's leadership, we offer the following excerpts from his letter, dated April 12, 1957:

Greeting and Blessing:

The Festival of Passover is inaugurated by the theme: "When your child will ask you," (about the rituals of Passover,) and the Seder is based on the commandment: "Then you shall tell your child."

There are various ways of asking questions and formulating answers, depending upon whether a child belongs to the category of the "Wise," the "Wicked," the "Simple," or "The One Who Knows Not How to Ask."

While the "Four Sons" differ from one another in their reaction to the Seder Service, they have one thing in common: they are all present at the Seder.

Unfortunately, there is another kind of a child: the child who is conspicuous by his absence from the Seder.

We must make every effort to reach the "lost" children, and bring them to the Seder table. Determined to do so, and driven by a deep sense of compassion and responsibility, we need have no fear of failure.

In order to remedy an undesirable situation of any kind, it is necessary to examine its origins. The same is true in this case.

Finding themselves a small minority and encountering certain difficulties, which are largely unavoidable in all cases of resettlement, some parents had the mistaken notion, which they injected also into their children, that the way to overcome these difficulties is to become quickly assimilated with the new environment.

By this attitude some had hoped to assure their children's survival. But what kind of existence is it if everything spiritual and holy is traded for the material? What kind of survival is it if it means the sacrifice of the Soul for the amenities of the body?

The event of the Exodus from Egypt and the Festival of Passover are timely reminders that the hope for survival, deliverance and freedom lies not in an attempt to imitate the environment, but rather in the unswerving loyalty to our true Jewish way of life.

Our ancestors in Egypt were a small minority, and lived in the most difficult circumstances. Yet they preserved their identity with pride and dignity, and tenaciously clung to their way of life, traditions and distinct uniqueness.

There is no room for hopelessness in Jewish life, and no child should ever be given up as a lost cause. Through the proper compassionate approach of Ahavas-Yisroel (unconditional love), even the "lost" children can be brought back to the love of G-d and love of the Torah. Not only can they be included in the community of the "Four Sons," but they can also be elevated to the rank of the "Wise" son.

May the gathering of the "lost tribes of Israel," and their assembly at the Seder table, hasten the beginning of the true and complete Redemption of our people, through our righteous Moshiach, speedily in our time.

With blessings for a Kosher and Happy Passover,

Rabbi Menachem M. Schneerson

Several months ago word spread over the Internet of a young girl named Lisa who was dying of Cystic Fibrosis in Israel. Her only hope was a lung lobe transplant. Doctors determined Ron Johnson of England was the best match. A dear friend of Farbrengen arranged for the child, her parents and Ron to come to the United States for the procedure. Unfortunately Ron's lung could not save her life, but his compassion touched many around the world. He sent the following letter (edited for space considerations):

To All the Lovely People out There,

Back in November I had the honour of donating part of my lung to 10 year old Lisa Ostrovsky. She was the daughter my wife and I never had, and we loved her as if she was ours.

Sadly, G-d called her to His Heaven on New Year's Day, after she had so bravely struggled to live. We can only imagine how her wonderful parents, Ilia and Valentina, felt at the loss of their angel.

Nobody will ever know the millions of tears that were shed across the world for Lisa. In the moments after her death, I looked up at the sky and knew she would be able to breathe properly in her new home.

The nagging doubt that will remain with me forever is that my lung was not good enough for her. I could have done more … stayed with Ilia and Valentina whilst Lisa was in intensive care … held her hand and talked to her more often after the operation … believed in prayer and spoken to G-d every day … but at least I had done something.

After returning from Lisa's funeral in Israel, I found—to my astonishment—over 800 e-mails from all over the world. All these wonderfully kind people … kept me from feeling sorry for myself, and gave me the courage to understand why Lisa had died … I am sure you will understand that I cannot reply personally to all of you, but, believe me, I will never forget your kindness, and will print out and keep each and every message.

Thank you, from the bottom of my heart. You have all been instrumental in my speedy return to good health.

Bless you all,
Ron Johnson

CHANGE IS GOOD

I greatly enjoyed reading your Chanukah issue of Farbrengen, and was particularly pleased that Chabad continues to stick with its high moral values and is trying to spread a little love and a lot of joy in the world.

I agree with Chabad that, "since one good deed leads to another, the entire world will change for the good. That's what redemption is all about."

Cordially Yours,
Ephraim Katzir
Fourth President of the State of Israel

WHERE DOES G-D RESIDE?

Dr. Brawer writes, "Although all creation is an expression of divine will, only in the Temple was G-dliness explicit." I disagree with Dr. Brawer and prefer to trust the esoteric approach of the Kabbalah, to go within to find Truth. One of the master Chasidic followers of the Baal Shem Tov once said in answer to the question, where does G-d reside: "He resides wherever He is let in." In the G-d-made human body, the temple of our soul, is the essence or spark of G-d. It is reached by going within by meditation and prayer.
For Chanukah you say, "darkness exists only to be turned into light"—but not by candles, by going within to find the most brilliant light of all.

MORE GOOD NEWS

I am glad that someone shares my thoughts on this world we live in. Sure there's the prejudice, the hate, racism, the killings and the thievery, but let us not focus on the negative elements within our society. Let us rather focus on the beauty, and oh...there's so much beauty out there. The good deeds we do. The little sparks that light up the darkness. That's what we should be focusing on.
Thank you Mike Indgin for a heart-warming story.

WHO NEEDS TO STRUGGLE?

In his article, DovBer Pinson writes, "In our lives this translates into the ability to welcome and appreciate our challenges and to deal with them as the very reason for our existence. The greater the struggle, the more rewarding the achievement." Is he by any chance trying to say that "struggling" is paid off with reward? I find it very difficult to believe that G-d would reward someone based upon his or her struggles in life. I believe G-d is all giving and gives of His goodness to all, regardless of the circumstances.

Beth Selinger

A FEEL-GOOD JUDAISM

In his article "Dear Rebbe," I think Yosef Jacobson is telling us that we can serve G-d at a level of personal love that goes beyond fear, respectful awe, and submission to the yoke of Heaven. I stress "I think" because both Jacobson and the concepts he presented are profound and not easily expressed in a brief article. His words can be misunderstood as justifying a superficial feel-good Judaism.
It appears to me that his honesty is more likely to provide help to those struggling to feel connected with G-d, than it is likely to give unhealthy license to those who would pull away.
If I have any criticism of Jacobson, it is that he attempted to take a topic about which he has deeply passionate feelings and profound thoughts and compress them into too tiny a "vessel." We need more from Jacobson—on the process of spiritual nullification of the self—without forgetting the obligation to G-d's will, even when we have doubts.

A DAY LATE, A YEAR EARLY

I read Farbrengen for the first time today and enjoyed it very much. I was much inspired by the whole tenor of the magazine and by many of the articles. The Chanukah walk-through, in particular, was deeply valuable. I only wish I had read it before Chanukah, but next year I'll be more available.
I have discovered for the first time the beauty of the tradition in which I was not really raised. Thank you for what you have passed on.

HISTORICALLY CORRECT

The article by Senator Lieberman was right on. I have read the history of our country's founders and they definitely wanted religion and G-d in our public lives. Sadly we see the results today of pushing Him out. "You reap what you sow."

JOIN THE ONGOING DIALOGUE BY POSTING YOUR OPINIONS ON OUR BULLETIN BOARD AT WWW.FARBRENGEN.COM

Cyberspace is potentially a very spiritual hangout. On the Internet, we're free to be in many places at once, distance becomes irrelevant, and even time feels less significant.

And since the Jewish word for "come together" is Farbrengen, it's natural that Farbrengen.com is bringing together a growing on-line community. Farbrengen.com recently hosted a discussion on how technology will affect our spiritual experiences. Marc Benioff of Oracle Corporation, Bruce Greenhaus of Qualcomm, Seth Weisberg of Stamps.com and Tzvi Freeman of AskMoses.Com explored the issue from all angles. Here are some excerpts:

FARBRENGEN: Where do technology and spirituality meet in Cyberspace?

BENIOFF: Technology is neither good nor bad, it's what we do with it that matters. Nevertheless, it must have arrived at this point in time for a reason and a purpose. Personally, I've been trying to integrate technology and spirituality for years.

WEISBERG: Its impact will stem from the decrease in barriers to communication and information. The Internet is the greatest tool for learning that has ever been developed.

GREENHAUS: I agree that the Internet will widen our minds and provide opportunities to learn that would never have existed without such technology. This conversation is one very indisputable manifestation.

WEISBERG: But does the medium depersonalize the process? Don't we need real-life people in a same place / same time paradigm for real personal and spiritual growth?

GREENHAUS: The Internet tends to be far "colder" than discourse in which people look into each other's eyes. Maybe it's lacking some of the mystical properties that surround a person's physical presence. Maybe it's merely the subtle nuances of body language and facial expressions that are lacking.

FARBRENGEN: At the same time, are there advantages to this form of communication beyond convenience and the ability to reach so far? Are there some aspects of the human being that we can actually reach better?

GREENHAUS: My immediate reaction is no … However, upon reflection there is a certain anonymity that, for some, is freeing. We all filter our thoughts, and the filter surely can't be the same when we're standing before someone as when we are at the great distance provided by Cyberspace. I'll have to contemplate this some more.

FREEMAN: I wonder if it doesn't also change the way we live, or even think about our lives. In his book No Sense of Place, Joshua Meyrowitz examines how the electronic media may change the way people use their minds—much as literacy has had a powerful effect on the way we think today.

BENIOFF: Sherry Turkle discusses similar ideas in Life on the Screen.

FREEMAN: Perhaps life in Cyberspace gives us an opportunity to explore realms of our subconscious and spiritual selves that we previously didn't even realize existed. Perhaps it allows us to see ourselves much as our Creator sees us. If you've ever created a RPG [role playing game], it certainly gives you that sense of being divine. You try to build in free choice for your users, but you always retain control over the Big Story.

BENIOFF: A "god game" is a good metaphor for all that we are creating with technology. Man reflects himself in his creation. Our reality is a reflection of our desire. We express our subconscious mind through our creation.

FARBRENGEN: Is this "The Big Computer" in reverse? Instead of a single all-powerful being overseeing all of humanity, the joint consciousness of humanity is reflected in this network of machines.

BENIOFF: Yes. But it's always been this way with technology. We are manifesting our image. The Internet is only a reflection of society. It is a mirror. As we reflect G-d, so does the Internet reflect us. Technology has always been man's mirror.

FREEMAN: Sometimes I get the feeling we have no control over where we're taking it. We think we're the archer, but we're really the arrow.

FARBRENGEN: How does all of this affect our destiny?

FREEMAN: It fits very neatly into the Kabalistic idea of humanity gathering and reconstructing the fragments of G-dliness. We come into the world and it seems to be a very finite place. But when we distill the pieces down to their bare essence, all the way down to just "on and off," "0 and 1," and then put them back together again, lo and behold—it's infinite.

GREENHAUS: Perhaps something of the person can express itself in Cyberspace that isn't allowed expression in real life.

BENIOFF: I understand where you're going. While I completely agree, I also believe it [technology] is ultimately just a reflection of us, not an extension.

FREEMAN: That's true in many ways. The Old Media does not reflect us very well; it forces us to think and create in very linear, fragmented ways. Now we are finally being freed from that. We're being empowered to develop and express ideas in unrestricted ways. And it's only going to expand much further.

WEISBERG: It goes back to the massive decrease in barriers to communication and information.

FREEMAN: That's part of what I meant by being infinite. Human beings are essentially infinite because we can blend all our forms of expression together without borders, and we can think in all directions at once. Even time and space are artificial borders for the human soul. When we restrict a person to creating within these very linear, fragmented confines, we put the human soul on a tight leash. The New Media empowers us by reflecting the border-trashing quality of the human soul.

FARBRENGEN: It has been said nobody ever dies in Cyberspace. They just transcend real time.

FREEMAN: That's another reflection of our inner potential. Humans have this unique ability to break out of themselves and be inside another person. We call it communication, and it's another expression of how boundless we are.

The Lubavitcher Rebbe once told my father-in-law, Professor Avraham Polichenco, that a computer is simply a device that makes many into one. When many are one, that one becomes infinite. I think that's a good description of where the Internet is heading.

BENIOFF: Our work will become a way of knowing G-d. After all, work is the purest expression of who we are.

CE UPON A BLUE MOON

By Dr. Laura Schlessinger

I have often said marriage is a covenantal relationship between a man, a woman, and G-d. I have said this with passion, with hope, and with sincerity. But I never really felt it until recently, when I had an experience that changed me in more ways than I can fully understand.

I've been to a lot of lovely weddings that joined lovely people into lovely marriages with lovely families. We all have. But have you ever been to a wedding where you actually felt the magic of a divine presence as part of the nuptials? Not to sound like Rod Serling, but I was recently at a wedding where, for the first time in my life, I actually felt that G-d was involved.

I'm passionate about my religion, but to be honest I have never felt loved by G-d—at least not in the same concrete way as a child who says, "Mommy, I love you." This particular wedding bridged that gap for me.

The wedding was between a young Chassidic rabbi that I know and a young lady from Brooklyn. They were matched up and suggested to each other. They were not forced into anything: they met each other, talked for a million hours, saw each other some more, talked for another million hours, and then made their decision. They are a match made in heaven. Just as one of the rabbis said, "They are two souls that were designated by G-d to come together." And they did.

It was my first Chassidic wedding, so naturally I asked a lot of questions. As it was explained, they both fast on the wedding day. It is a serious occasion when two souls are joined together for eternity in a connection with G-d and all of humanity.

As I walked down the hall to see Dov–the groom–before the ceremony, I found him in a big room amidst a group of Chassidic men. What I saw touched me profoundly: they were praying and singing. The groom hadn't eaten all day, but he was focused in prayer, reciting his texts. This is one of the most, if not the most profound and relevant transitions of his life. This is as far removed from a "bachelor party" as you can possibly get. This is true spiritual focus.

Throughout history, Orthodox Jewish thought has considered a man incomplete until he is married. It is the woman who is able to attain a more spiritual connection with G-d. Man must work a lot harder to connect. Together, their souls are complete.

Another fascinating point is the 2,300-year-old pre-nup agreement in which the groom gives the bride everything: his soul, his life, his possessions, everything. What does she give him in return? As I love to put it, she shows up.

During this time, the bride was in a separate room, sitting in an almost throne-like chair. My friends said that we should congratulate her and give her a blessing. I replied that I'd just seen her in the elevator and told her how nice she looked. "No, no, no," they said, "This is the time, just before a woman is married, when she is most connected to G-d. So if you want anything, like a prayer, this is when to ask it of her. She's almost like a conduit."

Personally, whenever I think about asking G-d for anything, the first thing that comes to mind are the children in hospitals with cancer—if G-d fixes them, I can get by. Otherwise, I don't ask for anything. My friends who are deep into prayer are often frustrated when I say this, but I just can't bring myself to do anything selfish. So I went up and said something to her privately.

Next the groom was led into the room by two men, one on each arm, who held him up since he could barely walk. The groom and I are friends from Chabad; when I saw him, I knew he was in a totally altered state. It was lovely to see the expression on his face, and he had tears in his eyes. He was so moved by what this meant for all eternity!

As he approached the bride, he put the veil over her face, which she could not see through at all; from then on, she was led around because otherwise she'd walk into walls. Listen to the philosophical and spiritual interpretation behind the veil: We marry because we're so turned on to the other person; they seem to be exactly what we want. They look good, they're this, they're that, but we don't really know them. We don't truly know the other's depths.

I'm passionate about my religion, but to be honest I have never felt loved by G-d—at least not in the same concrete way as a child who says, "Mommy, I love you."

They're hidden, and take time to reveal themselves. So too there are darker sides to all of us that we don't necessarily show. Part of the ritual of covering the face of the bride is that the groom is not seeing his pretty bride, but rather the totality of what he's committing his life to—including the things he doesn't know and cannot see. She commits herself to the same life together.

The ceremony was then moved outside, with the stars shining above. The groom stood under the Chuppa and the bride circled him seven times to build a fortress within which is an intense spirituality of love and commitment. This is the power of the woman, because she's so connected to G-d. When she joined him under the Chuppah, they didn't even kiss. No one who was watching threw anything. Only when it was over did they walk into a room to be alone, where together they broke their fast, held hands, and gave a kiss. That was the first time they had ever touched each other.

It was incredible to see how special everything was and to realize that it took thousands—thousands—of years to create this profound, stirring moment. There, under the stars, I really felt G-d's presence. For the first time, I knew it was a man and a woman in the sight of G-d. I saw it happen.

Awakening

By Anne Simon

The light began as a tiny, [illegible] at the [illegible] of my consciousness. A flickering spark that brightened into the warmth of a single candle. Then eight candles, growing brighter and brighter until they merged into a fiery yellow sun that exploded before my eyes.

Just as quickly, the light was replaced by a pale cream and white [illegible] hovering above me.

Yes, my name. Over and over.

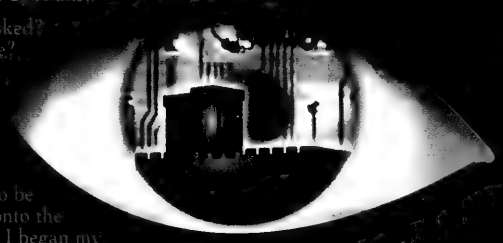
"Mr. Stein? Mr. Stein? Can you hear me, Mr. Stein?"

I think I nodded. I'm not sure. But in one moment of clarity, revealed a different scene, one filled with [illegible] strange, machine-like with multiple wiry appendages connected to each other and connected to me. Other machines were talking as they walked past...

Talking? Walking?

A dream. I thought, "Surely a dream." I must have spoken this aloud, because the vision in white, now revealed to be a young woman, whispered softly, "No." I was alive, awake, and lying in a hospital bed.

The voice, the soft voice, [illegible]. Her name was Hannah Levy, and she was a "Nanotech Resuscitation Specialist."



Did I remember being in the Swiss Alps, she asked? The avalanche?

When I didn't respond, her eyes became concerned. Did I remember who I was?

As her soft, calm voice continued, the incredible story of who, how, and why began to form.

I remembered yesterday, a cool spring day. It was going to be the adventure of a lifetime, dropping from a helicopter onto the pristine white snow. I remembered the rushing wind as I began my descent, my skis barely skimming the surface—And then the sound of Hell swallowing me whole. There was endless darkness and piercing cold and finally a last conscious thought, "Why had G-d dropped a mountain on me?"

Hannah's soothing voice brought my thoughts back. "You were frozen," she said, "Lost for over 100 years."

In that time, miraculous advances in physics had taken place. The mystery of how atoms worked had been solved. Quantum mechanics and relativity now meshed into a unifying definition of the universe. Tiny nanoassemblers that moved atoms with laser tweezers constructed anything and everything, including the intricate beauty of a human brain. My cells had been so well preserved, the neurons still connected, that the reconstruction of my brain had been possible. Intact DNA allowed the cloning of a new body.

"A miracle," I whispered in wonderment.

She smiled as her eyes filled with tears. "A miracle," she repeated, and then flipped a switch that caused the opaque wall to my left to fill with an image that stopped the universe in its tracks.

"I know that place," I gasped in awe.

For I looked upon the old city of Jerusalem, a fragile piece of history nestled reverently in the heart of a futuristic metropolis. There, at the edge of the old city that I knew so well, where I had prayed and my father had prayed and his father and his father before him, the vision that we had prayed for was seamlessly in place: the Temple—reborn, she said, from the very dust, the very atoms of the original.

I looked at Hannah, and her face filled with joy as she said that I was the miracle she had prayed for within those holy walls. A chance that one day she would be able to thank one whose faith and prayers so long ago had helped make the dream come true.

And as I looked into her shining face, I knew the answer to the question my soul had cried out yesterday, so many years ago.

A condition of freedom

A Slavery Called Freedom

By Rabbi Adin (Steinsaltz) Even-Yisroel

WOVEN THROUGH THE MAGNIFICENT tapestry of symbols, customs and ceremonies of the Passover Seder is the overriding theme of freedom.

Although freedom can be expressed in simple ceremonies such as reclining as free men, drinking four cups of wine and repeating the mantra "we are free men," the deeper concept of freedom actually envelops and permeates our essence.

Freedom is most often perceived as the absence of slavery—just as slavery can be defined as the absence of freedom. But in reality, the absence of slavery does not in itself create a condition of freedom.

Slavery is a condition wherein one is forever forced to act according to the will of another. Freedom is the ability of man to act and express selfhood.

In order for man to act independently, he must want to express his uniqueness. One who does not possess the desire for independent self-expression and fulfillment—either because his spirit has been broken or because it has never been developed—cannot be considered a free man. He is not free in spite of no longer being physically enslaved; he is merely an abandoned slave—a slave without a master.

The miracle of the Exodus was not completed with the Exodus itself. The Jewish people needed to be free men, not merely runaway slaves.

Abraham Ibn Ezra describes the situation thus: "At the shores of the Red Sea, the Jews genuinely desired to escape the burdens of slavery; but having lived their entire lives as slaves, they could not simply cast off the ingrained affinity they had for their taskmasters. Only after the generation born in slavery had passed on were the Jewish people able to enter the land of Israel to build a nation of free men."

A slave carries a double burden—he is forced to obey his master and has no will of his own. Thus a person who is cognizant of his or her uniqueness and individuality can never be enslaved. Conversely, one who does not possess this positive self-image can never be considered wholly free.

The same principles that enslave an individual can extend to an entire nation, in our current exile or galut. Real redemption involves more than leaving exile.

Implicit in the state of exile is the destruction and subjugation of the will of a nation and its collective yielding to the dictates of a foreign body. A group of people who leave their land of their own free will, who determine their way of life according to their own values, cannot be considered as living in exile. They are merely living temporarily in a foreign land. As long as they are at liberty to express their essential being, they are not true exiles. Exile is slavery only when it inhibits and stifles national self-expression and self-determination.

Like slavery, exile is to a certain extent a physical condition, but its essential quality is spiritual. It is surrender and abdication—accepting a set of values, attitudes and mores that are contrary to the private or collective self.

The persecuted Jew has been in exile for countless generations during which he has been required to change his way of living. A nation that was basically agricultural became a nation of merchants; an independent people was reduced to slavery and bowed to foreign rule, tossed about by every ill wind. But with it all—so long as the Jewish people held on to their heritage and spiritual principles, to their internal way of life and mode of behavior—they were not an enslaved people.

The Jew in all his years of exile and wandering had to make peace with his inability to be the master of his own fate in many areas of life. But his exile was never complete because the Jew did not regard himself as despised or inferior. So long as he retained the core of his inner self, his link with G-d not only consoled him but also served as his true homeland, an entity which exile could not harm or diminish.

Complete exile, spiritual as well as physical, began with assimilation. Whenever the assimilated Jew loses his unique sense of self, he loses his independence. Even if he is granted personal freedom, his national exile is total. His real self no longer guides his way of life. The life of the assimilated Jew is set and determined by foreign influences in both his spiritual and physical life.

Even when the assimilated Jew lives in a land where strangers no longer dictate how he must conduct himself, he is in a state of exile. He carries the condition of exile with him in its deepest sense. He is bereft of his true self, the self that leads him to freedom. Outside cultures may not physically enslave him, but they continue to rule him spiritually and rob him of his heritage.

A famous Chassidic teaching states, "It is easier to take the Jew out of exile than to take the 'exile' out of the Jew."

ARE YOU HAPPILY EVER AFTER?

By Moshe Wisnefsky

Romance. Passion. Love unrequited due to cruel twists of fate, or achieved due to good luck. These are the kind of romantic tensions that drive the plotlines of everything from dime novels and popular cinema to classic literary masterpieces. These love stories usually end with either catastrophic or blissful resolutions—everyone either dies (as in Romeo and Juliet) or "lives happily ever after." But in the Western mindset, life after the goal is reached, the "happily ever after" part, is rarely dealt with. The curtain simply comes down. Viewed as such, the romantic pursuit is, in effect, the goal.

In the Jewish view, romance is only a piece of a much larger puzzle—which includes both a clear picture of the blissful state being worked for and an equally clear way to live once that state has been achieved.

It is quite a difference.

During my youth, I was asked to deliver the sermon at my religious school's Consecration Service. I went on and on about the glories of being Jewish but then added that, even after years of religious education, I really didn't believe in G-d. Instantly, a hush fell over the room (voicing a thought like this thirty-odd years ago was taboo). Forging on, I concluded, "But although I may not have an unquestioning belief in G-d, I have my young, intelligent Jewish mind looking for Him, and who can say which position is better?"

As I returned to my seat, people whispered, "brilliant," and, "so insightful." The Rabbi took my place at the pulpit and said my attitude was, in fact, the real Jewish approach of constant questioning and searching rather than blind belief.

In other words, there are—so people think—only two possibilities: either you have blind faith in the stereotype of G-d, or you are on an often painful but dramatic, romantic search. To actually find G-d, or absolute meaning in life, and remain a mature, cultivated person is categorically impossible. As someone put it, "If you talk to G-d, you're holy; if He talks to you, you're insane."

If you ask the man on the street what he's working for in life, he might reply, "to make a better world." Then ask him, "And once we've eliminated war, injustice, disease, ignorance and all the rest—then what?" He'll probably shrug his shoulders. Similarly, ask a spiritually oriented person what Judaism is about and he or she might answer, "Our search for G-d." Follow with, "And once we've found G-d?" The response will probably be, "The searching itself is the finding."

Why this unwillingness to ask "what is it all for?" What does a real relationship with G-d mean?

Approaching G-d from the Western mindset that the pursuit equals the goal leaves most people without a developed grasp about who and what G-d is. And without this comes fear of the unknown. Many people are afraid to think about G-d because they're afraid of where it might lead them. It's safer to focus on "The Search" and forget about the possibility of "The Consummation," or to declare axiomatically that G-d has not actually communicated with us and never will.

Granted, this makes for a good, taut storyline that can hold people's attention until the final curtain. But if G-d created man and did not communicate what He wants of us, what does that tell us about G-d? Did He create us for sport, to sit back amused as we grope for an understanding of why we're here? Or is He actually incapable of communicating with us? What parent, after his child is born, throws him on the street and says, "OK junior, go experience life," or gives him a new car but never teaches him how to drive?

Although there are individuals and philosophies willing to accept such possibilities, Judaism considers them inconsistent with the nature of G-d. Judaism provides clear-cut concepts of who and what G-d is and what our relationship to Him can and should be. Precise answers are offered to the question of what the perfect world is and how to live "happily ever after." The Torah makes what we're searching for crystal clear.

But where, you may ask, is the romance in the relationship? Where are the passion and tension of the search? If we have all the answers neatly packaged, aren't we abrogating our free will and our spirit of inquiry?

The answer lies in the ultimate Jewish love song—the Song of Songs (Shir HaShirim)—that we read on Passover. Through the Haggadah we relive our people's exodus from Egypt. "Egypt" in Hebrew (Mitsrayim) comes from the word for "limitations" (meitzarim). "Going out of Egypt"—on a deeper level—means breaking out of our limitations and constrictions.

And since G-d is infinite, no matter how intense or fulfilled our relationship with Him is, we can always search for ways to attain a stronger, purer bond. Therefore, the minute we reach one level in our relationship with G-d, our love creates the yearning that compels us to strive for the next. In this context, each stage (each goal) is unique and attainable unto itself, "For this is very close to you: it is in your mouth and heart to do it" (Deuteronomy 30:14). Judaism offers us both the tension and passion of romance as well as the bliss and release of fulfillment. And each one feeds the other: the more intense the fulfillment, the greater the yearning for higher fulfillment; the greater the yearning, the more intense the resolution.

The Haggadah tells us to think of ourselves as going out of Egypt in every generation. Inner Dimensional Judaism adds: every day of our life, we pursue a constant romance and love affair with G-d.

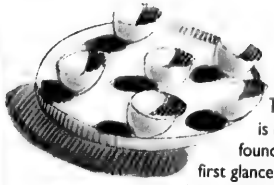
How the Kabbalah Describes Your Seder Plate

Thought for Food



The Seder Plate The Seder table is home to a group of items not usually found in the same place at the same time. At first glance they may appear rather ordinary or even downright trivial. But beneath their outer layers lies a powerful gift—precious insights waiting to be mined that transform these ordinary foods into extraordinary vessels for Holiness. To assure the gifts are received as intended, the Seder's revelations unfold in the same order as the events which led to redemption. In fact, the very word Seder means order.

Kabbalah divides the plate into thirds, with each portion possessing a distinct Divine Light, or Sefirah. The right third corresponds to Chesed (love, benevolence), the left Gevurah (self-discipline, fear of G-d), and the middle Tiferet (harmony, compassion). The plate contains six items and is upheld by three matzot, which according to Kaballistic tradition are handmade, round and concave to form a vessel with which to receive the Sefirah.

The Three Matzot Combine intellectual and emotional slavery with Divinely inspired faith, and you have the spiritual recipe for matzot. The mixture inspired our ancestors to follow G-d into the desert with such haste that there wasn't time for the bread that would nourish them rise. At least one ounce is eaten during the Seder.

The three matzot represent the entire Jewish people—Cohen, Levi and Israel. They also symbolize our Patriarchs' Divine attributes: Abraham, benevolence; Issac, self discipline; and Jacob, harmony.

The polar opposite of matza is Chametz, the epitome of arrogance and self-aggrandizement. Before Passover we remove all physical Chametz and seek to root out the spiritual Chametz from within.

Zeroah (Shankbone) The Pascal Lamb, sacrificed on the eve of the exodus as an expression of faith and self-sacrifice, is represented by the Zeroah. Mystical tradition replaces the shankbone with a chicken neck that is not eaten, as a reminder that although we approach freedom during the Seder, our ultimate freedom is soon to come with the final redemption.

Betzah (Egg) In the days of the Holy Temple a "Festival Offering" was made on Passover. Unable to do this in our current exile, the hard-boiled egg is used as a symbol of our mourning. In some ways, the choice reflects the nature of our people; the hotter the water, the stronger our spirit becomes.

The Four Cups of Wine The Four Cups of wine are consumed during the Seder to celebrate the stages of our Exodus and Redemption.

First Cup—Physical removal from the Land of Egypt ("I will release you");
Second Cup—Liberation from intellectual and spiritual slavery ("I will save you");
Third Cup—Creation of a people forever immune to permanent slavery ("I will liberate you"); and,
Fourth Cup—G-d's acceptance as His chosen people and the granting of the Torah at Sinai, which fulfill the purpose of our exodus. ("I will take you onto me as a nation").

Each cup should contain at least three and one half ounces of wine or grape juice.

It is said that the Prophet Elijah, who will herald the ultimate Redemption, visits every Seder table on Passover. We greet him by filling a fifth glass of wine toward the end of the Seder, "The Cup of Elijah," and inviting him into our homes with open doors.

The Four Sons

Despite his intelligence, the Wise Son insists on asking the same question year after year. He's also obsessive about the discussion thing, making it rather difficult to get on with the Seder.

A fun guy to have around, the Wicked Son's cynicism is driven by his need to fit things into his down-to-earth world. Sitting next to his wise brother, he injects spice into the evening with his snide and provocative comments.

Out there in a world of silent amazement, the Simple Son is a transparent channel for the Infinite. If only he could tell us about it.

The Son Who Doesn't Know How to Question probably thinks he is the wise son. When you know it all, there's nothing left to ask.

He's not in the photo, because he doesn't even know it's Passover.

The Fifth Son is the most important one. He's the son who has yet to experience the freedom of Passover.

Maror (Bitter Herbs) The bitterness of Egypt is brought to the table with Maror (horseradish). Through it, we realize that the purpose of hardship is only to make us stronger. One and a half ounces are eaten at two intervals during the Seder.

Karpas (Vegetable) Egypt crushed our ancestors' spirits with endless, senseless, back-breaking drudgery. A raw vegetable, usually an onion or potato, is dipped in saltwater and eaten so we may taste their anguish—and in it realize the potential to rise above our own.

Charoset (Paste) As slaves we used mortar — symbolized by Charoset — to make bricks that formed structures which were erected only to be destroyed. The apple mixed with nuts to make Charoset symbolizes the sweetness of the Jewish women who, knowing Pharaoh would kill their infant if it were male, hid in the apple orchards when giving birth.

Chazeret (Romaine Lettuce) The initial stages of exile were pleasant, yet soon the injustices of slavery became overwhelming. So too is the first taste of Chazeret (a herb, often romaine lettuce) mild, but soon its bitter root becomes dominant. Chazeret is eaten with the Maror, and in the Korech sandwich.

Your 15-Step "Soulful Seder" Companion

STEP 1

Bless the first cup of wine.

Kadesh, which means "set aside," begins the Seder by affirming our desire to elevate this night above all that is mundane. With it we declare to ourselves and all that are present that this is "The Season of Our Freedom." To stress this point, we recline to the left when drinking, as only free people did in ancient times.

The blessing is a spiritual wake-up call placed with the hope that we will open ourselves to the divine possibilities that await us.

STEP 2

Wash the hands (in the ritual manner but without reciting a blessing).

As the first step on the journey to freedom, we sublimate spiritual distractions by purifying our hands, the most active part of our body, with water.

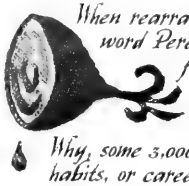
The Kabbalah teaches that hands represent expressions and attributes, while water epitomizes intellect and purity. Washing refines our attributes with intellect, enabling restrictions to turn into benevolence, hate into love, and personal slavery into freedom.

The observance, one of many during the Seder intended to pique the interest of children, awakens the innocence within each of us.

STEP 3

Recite the appropriate blessing for vegetables, then dip the Karpas vegetable in saltwater before eating it.

In the saltwater we can taste the tears of anguish and despair our ancestors shed as their spirits were crushed in Egypt.



When rearranged, the word Karpas allsudes to the word Perech, or "crushing labor." Our people were forced to perform senseless tasks in Egypt, endless drudgery without meaning, purpose or goal.

Why, some 3,000 years later, do mindless routines and habits, or careers driven by the need for status, still dominate our lives so often?

STEP 4

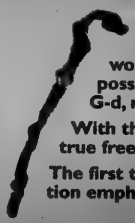
The middle matza (of the 3) is broken in two pieces. The larger piece, designated as the Afikoman, is wrapped and hidden away for the children to discover.

The smaller broken piece, the "bread of poverty," takes center stage while retelling the story of the Exodus. It personifies the spiritual and material destitution our people endured in Egypt once they no longer grasped the meaning of true freedom. By relating to their plight, we feel what is broken in our own humanity. At the same time, when the children hide the Afikoman we sense the larger dimension of our being, the part of our soul never touched by slavery that waits to be discovered.

FOUR WHAT?

Why does the number four reappear throughout the Seder? We drink four cups of wine, speak to the four sons, ask the four questions, and read the four expressions of redemption.

In Hebrew the number four is represented by the letter "daled," whose spelling forms the word "daless," meaning "there is none." Our people had to totally rid themselves of ego to become worthy of the highest possible connection with G-d, receiving the Torah.



With this bond they realized true freedom.

The first three expressions of redemption emphasize the need for Divine intervention to rescue our ancestors from the spiritual wasteland of Egypt.

However, the fourth and greatest level, "I will take you unto Me as a Nation," required the people to purify themselves—to achieve total self-nullification and thus become a vessel worthy to receive and carry forth G-d's infinite will.

STEP 5 MAGGID (TELLING)

"Tell your children G-d took you out of Egypt." Fill the second cup of wine, then retell the story of our rise from the depths of bondage to the heights of redemption.

Maggid begins with the children asking, "Why is this night different from all other nights?" The question can put us in touch with the innocence of children as we contemplate the dynamics of liberation.

Are we eating the matzah out of habit, or because we are ready to embrace its significance? Are we observing these rituals to assuage guilt, or to actualize the desire to live a more meaningful life?

When we allow the events in the Maggid to touch us to the core, we reveal the candor that children hold dear. At the conclusion of Maggid, we savor the second glass.

STEP 6 RACHTZAH (WASHING)

Wash the hands and recite the blessing, Ahl Netilat Yadayim (on the lifting of the hands).

We prepare to internalize the humble nature of matza by uplifting our extremities and expressions.

In its literal sense, the word netila means to move something from one place to another. With this blessing we remove the physicality and vulgarity that may dwell in and around the hands, raising them up for what is to follow.

STEP 7 MOTZI (BLESSING OVER BREAD)

Hold the broken half-matza and two whole ones while reciting the appropriate blessing for bread, hamotzie leh-chem min ha-aretz.

The word lechem (bread) contains the same letters as lochem (war). Food is raw energy that holds the potential for either good or evil. Thus, a spiritual battle ensues every time it is consumed. If the purpose in eating is solely to gratify physical cravings, evil prevails. However, when eating to gain energy with which to better serve G-d, good prevails.

STEP 8 MOTZI MATZA (BLESSING OVER MATZA)

Return the bottom matza to the Seder plate. Holding the remaining one and one-half matzot, recite the blessing for eating matza, ahl ah-chilat matza.

Our ancestors fled Egypt with inconceivable haste, leaving no time for the dough that would nourish them to rise. Once free, their first taste was the "bread of poverty," matza. From a mystical viewpoint, matza exemplifies a selfless ego. It was with this trait, rather than arrogance, that they accepted G-d-given freedom. Humility allowed them to appreciate the gifts of life.

After the blessing, recline to the left and eat at least one ounce of matza.

DO YOU KNOW WHERE YOUR KIDS ARE?

So much of the Seder is centered around stimulating children's interest because our survival hinges on their actions. If our people are to continue moving forward, it will be on the backs of the children. The principles of Passover are so fundamental to the existence of Judaism that we go all-out to instill them in every child: the wise, the wicked, the simple and the innocent. All of them must know what it means to be truly free so they will cling to that freedom with all their strength.

If this seems to be asking a lot, consider that the Talmud tells us that even in the slavery of Egypt our ancestors gave birth to a very special generation of children, the ones who answered G-d's call and followed Him out of slavery. Also, by concentrating on the needs of children, we reveal parallel needs within ourselves—allowing the entire Passover experience to become more heartfelt and meaningful.

STEP 9 MAROR (BITTER HERBS)

Take at least 3/4 ounce of bitter herbs and dip it in the charoset, shake off the excess, and recite the blessing ahl ah-chilat maror before eating.

Having meditated on the bitterness of exile during Maggid, we now physically experience its force. The impact further clarifies the significance of our exile.

Before we can experience true freedom we have to internalize the might of our hardship—and accept that when we make the right choices, hardship exists only to make us stronger.

STEP 10 [illegible] (SANDWICH)

Break off two pieces of the bottom matza (at least one ounce). Take 3/4 ounce of maror, dip it in charoset and shake off the excess. Place the maror between the two pieces of matza and say, "Thus did Hillel do in the time of the Holy Temple..." Recline while eating.

Maror alludes to the wicked, while matza refers to the righteous. Hillel, the great Jewish sage known for his compassion, instructed the righteous to reach out and draw the wicked closer.

Likewise, now that we have felt what it means to break free of slavery on a personal level, it is our obligation to share the experience with others.

STEP 11 [illegible] (TIME TO EAT)

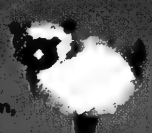
In many traditions the meal begins by dipping the hard-boiled egg from the Seder plate in saltwater to symbolize our constant mourning for the destruction of the Holy Temple, and to allude to G-d's desire to redeem His people.

"Ess, mein khind!"

Across the community and throughout the world, we are together at the Seder table. The wise, the wicked, the simple and the innocent, all equal in the eyes of each other and the eyes of G-d. And we remember the fifth son—he who has not yet experienced the freedom of Passover. We are united as one in the common goal of redemption.

His picture should be on the back of your matza box. The missing Jewish child. The Fifth Son. He's not at the Seder table, yet his spirit is our most important guest. He's searching. And though G-d knows what for, we will only touch the Fifth Son's heart by embracing him with the pure joy of our heritage.

WHAT'S IN THE FOOD?



The purpose of the Seder is to experience and reveal some of the loftiest truths in Judaism, so why all the focus on something as basic as food?

We are taught that when directed toward G-d, physical acts such as eating merge the essence of man and everything that surrounds him with the Essence of G-d. This only became possible after our ancestors left Egypt.

In preparation for the exodus, Moses instructed the people to sacrifice the Pascal Lamb, which the Egyptians worshiped as a deity. Egypt epitomizes slavery to all that is physical and mundane. To genuinely leave Egypt demanded more than simply obtaining spiritual freedom—it required that the freedom be used to transform all that is physical into that which is spiritual by employing it in service to G-d.

When we use the Seder food as an expression of faith and self sacrifice, we experience this freedom—so we eat to our soul's content.

STEP 12

At the conclusion of the Passover meal, children return the Afikoman. Eat at least one ounce of this matzah. Nothing else except the remaining two cups of wine is consumed thereafter.

It was necessary to partake in every step, every ritual, every taste and every thought before the Afikoman is revealed; then, we can become one with its Divine potential. We eat it only when completely satiated because it fulfills a need higher than the hunger for freedom, and we eat nothing afterward so that its taste remains with us.

In the Seder, as with everyday life, there are no shortcuts to the greater dimension. Yet we are always aware that it is present and yearns to reveal itself when we seek with a pure heart.

STEP 13

Recite the blessing over the third cup of wine, then drink while reclining. In anticipation of our Ultimate Redemption, we now fill a special goblet, the Cup of Elijah. We then open the door to the house and, holding a lit candle, recite the passage inviting the Prophet Elijah to appear.

Imagine all of creation in a state of spiritual and material freedom. Think about a world free of pain and suffering, war and struggles. Imagine all of existence at this level. Imagine yourself, the light of a single candle, ushering in the era of our redemption.

STEP 14

We offer praise to G-d for his mercy and compassion in redeeming our people from Egypt, and in anticipation of our own ultimate redemption.

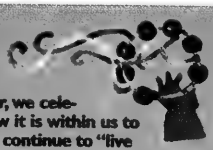
Why does G-d need us to praise Him? He doesn't, we do. As the Kabbalah explains, when we praise His kindness we reveal His compassion. When praying for our needs, we evoke His desire to give.

STEP 15

The Seder concludes with the wish, L'shana Ha-ba-ah Bi-Yerushalayim. We hope for each other that which our forefathers prayed for while enslaved in Egypt, "Next Year in Jerusalem!"

Rabbi Schneur Zalman of Liadi omitted the passage, "The order of Passover is concluded," from his Haggadah because the Seder's message remains timeless. Every day, one leaves Egypt by transcending his limitations, to reach higher levels of holiness.

WHY ARE YOU SMILING?



"This year we are slaves ...next year we will be free men."

If we are still in slavery, why do we celebrate our freedom?

On a personal level, we rejoice because when our people were freed from Egypt, the seed of true freedom – an individual's ability to control his own destiny – was planted within the world. We celebrate the capability to overcome our own inner struggles and constantly move forward.

"Exile ... liberated."

On a universal scale, our ancestors' redemption provided the impetus for our future redemption, the time when all people will experience ultimate freedom.

So even though " this year we are slaves ..." and continue to struggle with bitterness in our own lives just as surely as we taste it in the maror at the seder, we celebrate because we know it is within us to be free. And while we continue to "live in exile ..." with nations at war and people oppressed around the world, we celebrate because we know one day we will achieve the final redemption, "Next year in Jerusalem."

Things To Do Before You Passover

Before Passover

It is forbidden to eat Chametz—all leavened foods that contain wheat, barley, oats, rye or spelt—on Passover. So collect products containg Chametz and isolate them in a designated "Chametz Closet." Then clear the house of any possible remaining Chametz: empty clothes pockets, vacuum cleaner bags, even the pet food goes into the Closet. Since you'll use a separate set of dishes for Passover, the Chametz dishes get locked up too. Now stock up on Kosher-for-Passover items; for good leads on Passover foods check out www.ok.org.

Chametz For Sale

Because it is even prohibited to "own" Chametz during Passover, lock your "Chametz Closet" and sell its contents to a non-Jew by filling out a "Mechirat Chometz" form. Sound complicated? It is, so ask your Rabbi to make the arrangements. Or log on to www.chabad.com to sell your Chometz online.

4/18 Search For The Chametz

At nightfall* begin the "formal search" of the house for Chametz (blessing 1). Traditionally, we use a candle to light the way, a spoon (as a shovel), feather (as a broom) and a paper bag to collect any Chametz found. After the search, place everything you found in a conspicuous place to be burned in the morning.

4/19 Fast Of The Firstborn

When G-d slew the firstborn of Egypt, he spared the firstborn sons of Israel. Out of gratitude all firstborn sons fast on this day.

Prepare To Celebrate

Stock up on Seder foods well before Passover begins. But wait. To build an appetite for the Seder abstain from eating any Seder plate foods today (page 10), especially Matza. So if you're a lover of bitter herbs and raw onions, stay out of the kitchen.

Burning Of The Chametz

In the morning* burn all the Chametz found during the the previous night's formal search.

Making Nothing Into A Big Deal

After cleaning the house, and selling and burning the Chametz, the head of the household says the appropriate prayers (blessing 2), verbally disowning any Chametz that might have been overlooked.

4/19 Time To Seder

The Eruv Tavshilin is prepared before sundown. At sundown candles are lit* (blessings 3 and 4). At nightfall the Seder begins.*

4/20 Brighten Up

Before the second Seder begins*candles are lit after nightfall* from a pre-existing flame (blessings 3 and 4). Tonight we begin to count the Omer, which lasts for 49 days. What's the Omer? In the Holy Temple the Omer was an offering of barley taken from the first grain of the new crop. We count seven weeks, from the bringing of the first Omer offering (Passover) until the day we received the Torah (the Festival of Shavuot). The 49 days between Passover and Shavuot represent the 49 steps of mystical self-purification and preparation our people went through between leaving Egypt (Passover) and receiving the Torah (Shavuot).

4/21 Shalom Shabbat

Before sundown, Shabbat candles are lit* from a pre-existing flame (blessing 5).

4/22-4/25 Four Intermediates Only

In between the first two and last two days of Passover, go ahead and function relatively normally. The only exception is, like your mother keeps telling you, you shouldn't work too hard. But keep the wine flowing; it's a custom to drink a glass of wine every day of Passover.

4/25 And On The Seventh Day

At sundown light candles* (blessing 3). This day marks the Miracle of the Splitting of the Sea and our total liberation from Egypt. In commemoration, we stay up all night studying Torah.

4/26 The Finals

After nightfall light candles* from a pre-existing flame (blessing 3). This day, the final day of Passover, emphasizes an even higher level of freedom. It is dedicated to our imminent and Final Redemption.

4/27 Last But Not Least

Yizkor memorial prayers are recited during services. Following the custom of the Ba'al Shem Tov, Passover concludes with a "Feast of Moshiach"—a festive meal complete with Matza and, yes, four cups of wine. It begins before sunset and is designed to greet Moshiach, offering us "a glimpse of the Messianic age." Nightfall marks the official conclusion of Passover.* Wait an hour to give the Rabbi enough time to buy back your Chametz and then, eat Chametz to your heart's content.

In a Heartbeat

Blair P. Grubb, M.D.

MANY YEARS AGO, after graduating from medical school, I worked for several months in a clinic in El Valle, a little town in the central highlands of the Dominican Republic.

The staff at the clinic consisted of myself, another physician fresh out of school, and a nurse—all under the supervision of a doctor who'd just completed his residency. Together, the four of us lived and worked in a cinder block building with two examination rooms, a small surgical area, a waiting room, and some tiny sleeping quarters.

Since the nearest hospital was more than an hour and a half's drive away we offered the only medical care for the entire region. Despite our meager stores of drugs and equipment, we saw nearly 70 patients each day and treated every conceivable disorder. People would literally walk barefoot for a day to come to our clinic, and often were hopelessly ill. I felt as if I'd somehow been transported back in time to a different reality, far from the one I had known.

Although I spoke workable Spanish, communication was often difficult because many of our patients were French-speaking migrant workers from Haiti who spoke Spanish haltingly. Once, a young Haitian woman was brought to us in a state of shock after her arm was mangled by a threshing machine. We rushed her to our makeshift operating room and poured IV fluids into her as we struggled to control the bleeding.

Her hematocrit was so low it barely registered on our equipment. She needed blood badly, and it was clear that we were going to lose her without it.

The sole method we had for giving blood was a direct transfusion from one person to another. With our rudimentary blood-typing kit, the only potential donor we could find was her younger brother. His Spanish was poor, but he seemed to understand when we explained that we needed to take some of his blood to save his sister. He turned a little pale, sat silent for a moment, and asked if there was any other way. "No," I replied, and he slowly nodded his head in agreement.

We placed an IV in him and began transfusing his sister. Almost immediately, she started regaining her color. Her brother smiled as he saw this, then turned his head to me, and in his soft, broken Spanish asked, "Cuando voy a morir?"—"When will I die?" I stood dumbfounded, and then realized he'd misunderstood our explanations and thought we needed all his blood to save his sister.

The situation seemed humorous until a stunning fact hit me. This child, this precious child, with hardly a moment's hesitation, had been willing to sacrifice his life to save the sister he loved. At that moment, I stood in awe of this boy. As I looked down at him, his face glowed with a kind of radiance, and despite his fear, he seemed at peace.

Seder Memories
There was always trouble with my cousins and my brother Jay. We would drink Manischewitz and get yelled at by the mothers, "Don't do it, you'll be a shiker!"

Kids and Passover
My seven-year-old just gets in the car and starts belting out Dayenu for no particular reason.

The Passover Tradition
We urge the kids to appreciate what they have; the Jewish people went through such hardships and overcame them--and still are overcoming them. We try to remember how they stood up with dignity under the worst circumstances.

Bubbie
My bubbie was an incredible woman. If she were expecting fifteen people for dinner but another forty showed up, she'd just throw in more matza meal.

Gefilte Fish
My dad's eighty-two, and he still tells my kids about the carp in the bathtub; they kept it in the tub since it had to be fresh. Around Passover, nobody could take a bath since the carp had to have his bathtub.

Holidays and Family
Even though my wife and I split up three years ago, we and our dear friends continue to come together for the holidays. No matter what people go through in their lives, whether they're together or apart, you still have them as family. The rituals of Passover have helped many people heal what they've been through over the years.

Home Movies
I've been watching twelve years of videotapes to make the compilation for my daughter Audrey's Bat Mitzvah. I think these videos are as long as the holidays.

My Yiddishe Mama
You don't want to upset your mother; the strongest person on Earth is the Jewish mother. They will not be told no, and they'll get anything done that needs doing. They're actually the basis for why populations aren't wiped out--and why people have so much love.

My Dream for my Kids
I have two sisters that passed away; my kids look at them like two angels floating over them, but they feel the loss and know how much it hurts. So I know what I want for my kids--I want them to be alive and healthy and content.

Life
Beshert is not a bad way to look at things. Don't fear things that happen to everybody.

Charity
Doing two or three things with your whole heart carries more weight than the twenty-three things you'd do just to look like a "good guy."

The Connection to G-d
G-d is truth. Whenever you get goose bumps--from a beautiful song, or something you've read, or a smell in the air--that is a connection to G-d.

Rodney Dangerfield
I love him in a way only a younger Jewish man can love an older Jewish man. I don't care if he's dead, I'm bringing him to my seventy-fifth birthday. He always shows up when things get rough; when my sister passed away five years ago, he came to the Shiva and made my family laugh. He was incredibly inspirational.

Laughter
You really can never have too much of it. Although if you're laughing 24/7, you might be nuts.

WHO NEEDS ORGANIZED RELIGION?

By Tamar Frankiel

Surely we don't. After all, we're the descendants of Abraham, the man who sought G-d on his own, who listened to the personal call of G-d to leave his home and birthplace. He left behind the "organized religion" of Mesopotamia and never founded one of his own. Don't the prophets rail at the dulling effects of organized religion?

Judaism has always been among the least organized religions, and one could argue that it's for the best. We can follow most of the mitzvot as individuals or families in the privacy of our own homes. To have a full prayer service, we only need a quorum of ten. And if we want to learn, we can simply sit down with someone more learned than ourselves. This is barely organized religion. Why do we need big synagogues with their committees and lecture series? The best argument for organization is probably to educate the children, but even that could be handled on a small scale.

When we complain about organized religion, it's because we recognize that it can easily become empty. The great Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik wrote of this tendency in his famous book, The Lonely Man of Faith. Our religious communities often become what he calls the "majestic community," projects of humanity in the creative aspect of mastering the world. Religion becomes a way of creating pleasure and satisfaction, rising above mere animal survival by providing comfort and happiness.

But there is often something missing—a sense of meeting heart to heart in what Rabbi Soloveitchik called the "covenantal community." In the covenantal community, we reveal ourselves to one another in our deepest essence; we see each other's unique truth. This can be hard to find in many of our religious organizations, where we readily become preoccupied with mastering disorder and maintaining the organization itself. Then, when our synagogues are missing that special quality, we're tempted to bail out and search for true and deep relationships elsewhere, often just in the friendships life brings us.

When our synagogues are missing that special quality, we are tempted to bail out and go searching for true and deep relationships elsewhere

This doesn't solve the problem, however, because there is another answer to the question, "Who needs organized religion?"

G-d does. G-d is in need of man. G-d asks us to change the world. If we want personal religion, we can have it in our own homes. But we are also called to transform the world at large. We may personally prefer to travel the more intimate road of Abraham and his companions. But G-d also wants us to remember King David and his son Solomon, who built a Temple whose light shone out into the world.

We find our personal nourishment in the divinely-guided relationships we form, inside or outside of synagogues. Our sources of inspiration can be our spouses or our best friends, our chavura or our monthly luncheon, our rabbi or our dentist. But wherever the inspiration comes from, we must take that energy and put it to use for the community—the covenantal community working within the majestic community. Judaism insists that ultimately there is no separation between the personal and the public realm. G-d's will is manifest in both.

We may feel differently about these two levels of community and relate to them differently. That is because we suffer from a sense of separation between soul and body, the internal and external. Our challenge is to overcome that separation and make the majestic community reflect more fully the integrity of the intimate covenantal community.

Fusing these two worlds requires some sacrifice. It may mean wading through bureaucracy and putting up with people who are not on the same spiritual wavelength. Each day, we have to patiently reimagine the community we ultimately want to create so that it expresses more light and loving kindness than when we began. This sacrificial action is the nature of giving to G-d. In this mode, we don't go to synagogue to receive, but to give.

When we do this, another truth appears: religious organizations are where we're more likely to find what Kabbalah calls our "Companions," those who travel the same spiritual pathways as we do. Yes, there are people in synagogues who are there for extraneous reasons—because their kids are in Hebrew school or because they feel obligations to their parents' faith. But even those reasons are a thread of connection, a sign of wanting to be in the covenantal community that stretches across the generations.

And most people are there for much deeper reasons. They are searching too. We may find, when we begin to reveal ourselves more deeply, that a new Companion is sitting next to us at one of those unending committee meetings.

So before you cancel your membership, look at your relationship with organized religion. Sometimes you may find that it is truly not responsive, and you may have to seek elsewhere. But you may also find another way, and other people right where you are, to help you transform your local organized religion into a living religious organism—a radiant center of vitality, joy, and hope.

IS G-D PRO

G-d chose to be "affected" by what we do: to take "pleasure" in our accomplishments and to be "angered" by our transgressions.

He chose to give himself these traits in order to enable us to relate to Him in a way that is meaningful to us.

By Yanki Tauber

Many of our sages have expounded on two cornerstones of Jewish faith: G-d's all-encompassing knowledge and man's alleged freedom of choice. Much has been written on the apparent contradiction between the two. We are told that "All is foreseen, and freedom of choice is granted" (Ethics of the Fathers, 3:15). But how can this be? If there are no limits to G-d's knowledge, how can man have real choice? If G-d already knows what I will do tomorrow, is not my freedom to choose an illusion?

Maimonides (Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon, 1135-1204) writes:

Freedom of choice has been granted to every man... As it is written: "See, I have set before you life [and good, and death and evil]" (Duet. 30:15)... Were G-d to decree that a person be righteous or wicked...what place would His Torah have? By what measure of justice would G-d punish the wicked and reward the righteous...?

One may ask: "G-d certainly knows all that will transpire... [so] if He knew that a person would be righteous, then it would be impossible for that person not to be. And if you say that He knew that the person would be righteous but it was nevertheless possible that he might be wicked, than G-d's knowledge was not complete!" ...Understand well what I am going to say. We have already explained in the second chapter of Laws of the Torah's Foundations that G-d does not know with a "mind" that is distinct from His being, as is the case with man whose being and mind are two distinct entities. Rather, He and His "mind" are one and the same—a concept that is impossible for the human mind to fully comprehend... We lack the capacity to know the nature of G-d's knowledge of all creations and all events. But this we know without doubt: the deeds of man are in his hands, and G-d does not compel him to do anything...."

The Raavad (Rabbi Abraham ben Dovid 1120-1198) takes issue with Maimonides' approach:

Maimonides did not act in the manner of the wise: one ought not to begin something that he is incapable of concluding. He poses a difficult question, then remains with the difficulty and reverts to faith. It would have been better for him to have left it as a matter of faith, instead of making the innocent aware [of the contradiction] and leaving their minds in doubt.

Raavad concludes by offering at least "something of an answer." He argues that G-d knows what man will choose, but that this knowledge has no effect on the nature of man's choice. He compares it to "the predictions of stargazers, who know, by some other means what the behavior of an individual will be" but in no way determine it.

The Tosfos Yom Tov (Rabbi Yom Tov Lippman Heller, 1579-1654) cites an answer offered by the Midrash Shmuel (Rabbi Shmuel Uceda, circa 1575):

There is no contradiction. G-d's knowledge of the future is the result of His observing the deed that the person is doing. Just as a person's observation of the deeds of his fellow in no way compels his fellow's actions, so too is it with G-d's observation of one's deeds. One cannot argue that because G-d knows the future actions of man He therefore compels them, since He is not governed by the laws of time... There is no "future" in G-d's reality—the whole of time is "present" to Him.

Tosfos Yom Tov concludes, "Indeed, this is consistent with the conclusion of Raavad, who compares G-d's knowledge to that of a stargazer."

Some Questions

So why would Maimonides begin a philosophical discussion of an issue to which there is no philosophical answer?

The Midrash Shmuel's contention appears to be well substantiated. G-d is the Creator of time and space. From His vantage point, the whole of time is an open book. To say that He "already" knows the future "before" we mortals have reached that juncture is to speak of His reality in limited terms.

Why doesn't Maimonides offer this answer? Why does Raavad, who seems to offer this explanation, refer to it only as "something of an answer" and concede that there is no definitive solution? And if there is a flaw in Midrash Shmuel's answer, was he unaware of it?

Another Kind of Knowledge

The key to all this lies in Maimonides' "non-answer." Instead of simply saying that we cannot grasp the nature of G-d's "mind," Maimonides refers to his earlier point that G-d and "His mind" are one. Let us examine his detailed formulation of this point in Chapter Two his Laws of the Torah's Foundations:

All existences aside from the Creator, from the highest [spiritual] form to a tiny gnat in the belly of the earth,

CHOICES?

If there are no limits to G-d's knowledge, how can man have real choice?

If G-d already knows what I will do tomorrow, is not my freedom to choose an illusion?

exist by virtue of His reality. So in knowing His own reality, He knows everything....

He does not "know" with a mind that is distinct from Him, as we know. We and our minds are not one; but the Creator—He, His mind, and His life, are one from every side and from every angle and in every manner of unity. For were He to...know with a "mind" that is distinct of His being, there would exist several "gods"—He, His mind, etc...

Thus, He does not know the creations by perceiving them, as we percieve them; rather, He knows them through His perception of Himself.

In other words, the very attribution of "knowledge" to G-d is problematic. Our definition of "knowing" presupposes several components to the knower—the "I" that possess the knowledge, the "information" I possess, and the "mind" by which I possess it. True, these components become fused into a single entity, but G-d is a pure singularity, not a composite entity. Maimonides therefore states that G-d's knowledge of the intricacies that comprise our existence are, in truth, but a single knowing. G-d does not know Himself via a "mind" that is a distinct from Him; He, His knowledge, and His "mind" are a single unit.

Chassidic teaching takes this a step further. The world was created through G-d's knowledge. In choosing to "know" Himself as the source of the created existence, the Almighty grants creation its validity and being.

In the words of Rabbi Schneur Zalman of Liadi:

G-d's...[knowledge] itself is its very life and being and that which brings it into existence from nothingness into actuality.

According to this, one obviously cannot describe G-d's knowledge of the future as resulting from the facts and events of our existence. Actually, the very opposite is true: the facts and events of our existence result from G-d's knowledge of them.

The Tzimtzum

In addition to this singular, all-embracing, creating knowledge, there exists another level of Divine knowledge.

In essence, G-d is wholly untouched by the deeds of man: "If you are righteous, what do you give Him? What can He possibly receive from you?" (Job 35:6-7). Yet G-d chose to be "affected" by what we do: to take "pleasure" in our accomplishments and to be "angered" by our transgressions. He chose to give himself these traits in order to enable us to relate to Him in a way that is meaningful to us.

This phenomenon is referred to by the Kabbalists as the tzimtzum ("contraction")—G-d is projecting Himself in ways that are "confining" to His essence, assuming definitive attributes so He can relate to us on our terms.

On this "tzimtzum" level, G-d knows us in a way that is comparable to the workings of the human mind—with a knowledge that results from what we do. At the same time, He also knows us with a higher "pre-tzimtzum" knowledge: a knowledge that is not caused by but is the cause of its contents. Chassidic teaching refers to these two levels as G-d's "higher knowledge" and His "lower knowledge."

Knowing the Unknowable

With this in mind, we can begin to understand the various approaches to the issue of Divine knowledge and human choice.

G-d's effect upon our existence is confined to tzimtzum contraction. So on the most basic level, there is no contradiction in the first place, since G-d's "lower knowledge," although unbounded by time, space or other limits, otherwise resembles knowledge as we know it.

Ultimately, however, G-d does not know things because they occur. He knows them by knowing Himself, and His knowledge of them is the source of their very existence.

This "higher knowledge" is part of the pre-tzimtzum reality and, as such, has no perceptible effect on our choices. This is why the Midrash Shmuel and others feel that it is sufficient to deal with the issue of "Divine knowledge and human choice" on the level of "lower knowledge."

Nevertheless the Raavad considers the "stargazer" explanation as only "something of an answer," for it fails to resolve the contradiction as it pertains to the essence of G-d's knowledge. The Raavad, therefore, feels that Maimonides ought not to have begun discussion of an issue that ultimately extends beyond the parameters of logic.

Maimonides disagrees. He chooses specifically to address the higher level of Divine knowledge. For man must not only believe that the Almighty's reality extends beyond what is rationally accessible to the human mind—he must also understand and appreciate the depth of the supra-rationality of the Divine.

Indeed, if we are not bothered by the question of how G-d's knowledge is to be reconciled with the freedom granted to man, then our perception of G-d's knowledge is limited to its "lower" aspect. To grasp the truly super-logical nature of G-d's "mind" is to understand that it, as His essence, is affected by nothing and is the ultimate effector of all.

CHASING MATZA

BY STEVE LUBET

Many ethnic and religious groups have their own unique foods. Some of these dishes—say, duck's feet or sheep intestines— may seem strange and challenging to outsiders, but they're just another meal to members of the clan. Of course, the special food isn't always quite so exotic. Every spring during Passover, the eight days when Jews recall the Exodus from Egypt, we commemorate the flight by eating matzah – a big, flat, unleavened cracker that we substitute for bread. It's a tradition – a somewhat dry tradition, but a tradition nonetheless.

This year, my family has already stuffed every possible pantry and cabinet with matzah. There are several five pound boxes stored under the dining room table, and our coats have been moved so we can use the hall closet for more. We've just about run out of space on the ground floor, but there's always the spare bedroom and the guest bath. We've stockpiled so much we could start our own kibbutz, but it's still not enough. I'll be picking up another load later today. I don't intend to take any chances.

Last year we ran out on the sixth day. And therein lies a tale.

"Not to worry," I told my good wife, as she shook the crumbs from an empty carton. "I'll just zip over to the supermarket and pick up a few boxes from the display at the entrance."

Within minutes, I was walking through the automatic door. To my horror, though, the Passover goods were gone — replaced by a case of cast-iron woks and pre-packaged stir-fry vegetables. There wasn't so much as a jar of gefilte fish. Fighting panic, I began searching the store.

I live in a community that prides itself on diversity, so I wasn't surprised to find an entire shelf of kimchee. I fully expected the six varieties of feta cheese. I stumbled across curry paste, dried cod, bok choy, jicama, sesame tahini, and buckwheat soba. I saw soy sauce, jerk sauce, barbecue sauce, tzatziki sauce, Alfredo sauce and tandoori sauce. I passed English muffins, French baguettes, Italian focaccia, Syrian pita, Mexican tortillas, Indian na'an, and something called "lavash" (which I think is Finnish, or maybe Lebanese).

In desperation, I sought help. "Could you please direct me to the matzah?," I asked a Korean lady who was putting out fruit.

"No problem, aisle three," she said. So I ran there, and found plenty of matzah... rella cheese. They had it fresh, aged, shredded, and sliced—but it was no help to me. Undaunted, I asked the Hispanic deliman behind his counter.

"Over there," he told me, "aisle eight." Which is where I found, on sale no less, several neat rows of Motts juice boxes.

"Help! Matzah!" I cried to no one in particular. A young Pakistani trainee heard my plaintive wail.

"Perhaps you should try that direction," pointing to the other end of the store. I ran, hopes rising, only to find a mountain of Mutsu apples.

Ready to admit defeat, wondering if my mother might have an extra box, I collided headlong with the middle-aged African American "assistant manager". "What's the matter?," he asked sympathetically.

"Matzah," I choked, truly a voice in the wilderness. "I need matzah."

"Right at the end of aisle five," he said reassuringly. "You should have asked for me sooner."

I embraced him, eyes moist and hands shaking. "Thank you, thank you," I said. "You don't know what an ordeal this has been."

"Nothing to it," he replied. "Happens to lots of people this time of year. Maybe that's why they call it the bread of affliction."

In Kosher Style

By Rita Milos Brownstein

Although every holiday commemorates an event in our history, Passover has a particular distinction.

It not only led to our freedom but was the first holiday the Jewish people ever celebrated. For this reason, it is traditional that Passover be celebrated in a lavish fashion.

The seder table, the focus of our attention, should be adorned as beautifully as possible, even to the point that we feel like royalty.

Although the mood may be regal, the odds are that we felt somewhat differently during the days of preparation leading up to the seder. In many homes the scene can be described almost as frantic as products containing chametz are put away, special dishes unpacked and, of course, the meal planned and prepared.

To make at least one aspect of the meal— the dessert—actually fast and easy, you might like to try these simple but delicious offerings.

You'll find a plethora of prepared Passover sponge cake and boxed mixes that make our Berry Trifle much less work than a scratch cake.

Passover
Sponge Cake Berry Trifle
Serves six - eight people

Ingredients: (Be sure items are marked Kosher for Passover)

1 prepared Passover sponge cake
2-12 oz. packages of frozen mixed berries, thawed
3/4 cup granulated sugar
4 cups non-dairy whipped topping
1 pint fresh berries
Fresh mint

1. Cut sponge cake into 12 slices, reserve. Mix thawed berries with sugar and let macerate for 1 hour.

2. To assemble, place half of the berry mixture in the bottom of a 2 quart bowl or trifle dish. Layer half with cake, berry mixture and whipped topping. Repeat one more time and refrigerate. (Prepare as close to the meal as possible.)

3. When serving, garnish with fresh berries and mint.

Layers of cake, berries and whipped topping look almost too pretty to eat. Be sure to use a glass trifle bowl for full visual impact.

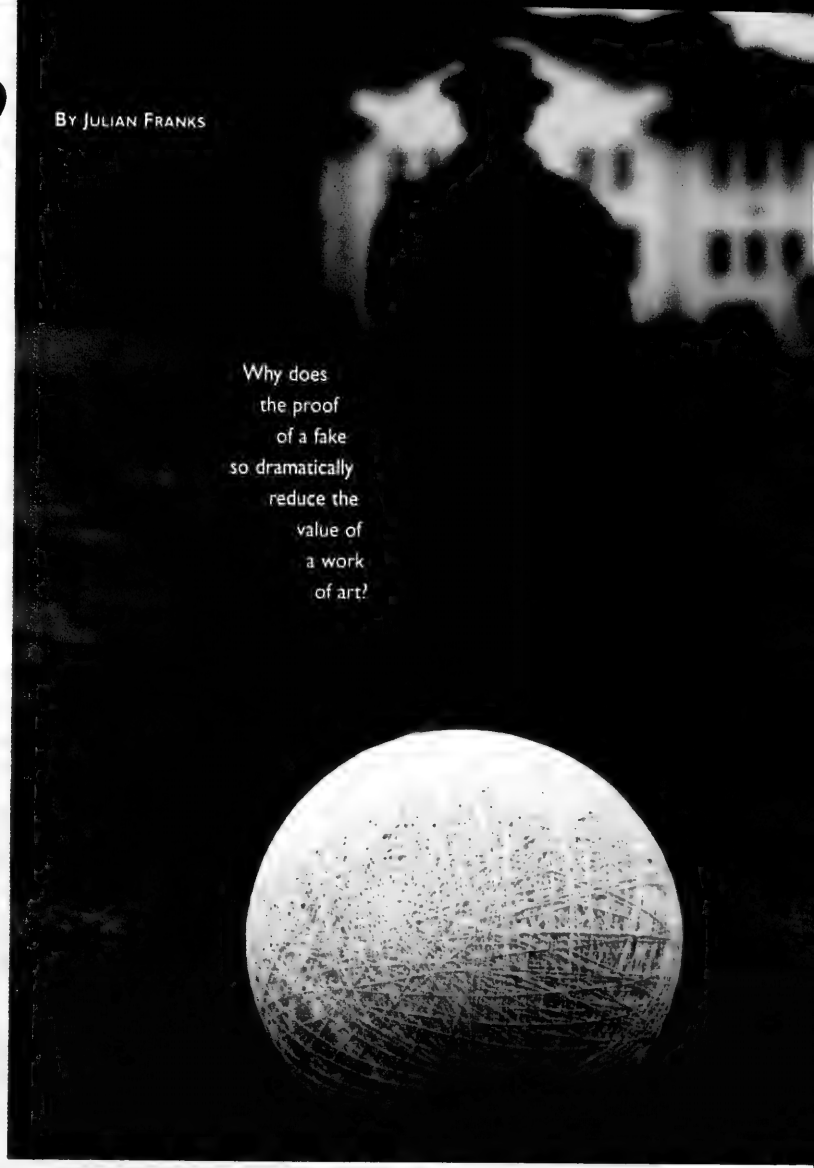
DOES FAKE HAVE VALUE?

By Julian Franks



Why does the proof of a fake so dramatically reduce the value of a work of art?

Some years ago, I was sitting with my family by a swimming pool reading some lectures and essays by the great Canadian author Robertson Davies. They were published posthumously by his wife in the book, The Merry Heart. One of those essays, entitled "Painting, Fiction and Faking," was particularly fascinating. Davies was trying to explain why we care so much about who painted a particular painting—for example, whether it was created by Van Gogh or by some other artist. He asked why a painting's origin is of such great importance to the pleasure we derive from it, and why these origins are so intricately linked with its value. Why does the proof of a fake so dramatically reduce the value of a work of art?

The questions raised by Robertson Davies are relevant to one of the great issues regarding the divinity of the Torah. There are those who sincerely accept the Torah and Jewish teachings, but who find it difficult to believe that it came directly from G-d through our teacher Moses. They can accept, however, that it was inspired by G-d although written by mortal man—or in some cases, by more than one man or woman. The argument of Robertson Davies can be applied as an analogy to show the deficiency of this position.

Davies relates the story of the artist Henricus Van Meergeren, who was accused after the war of collaboration with the Nazis. His accusers claimed he sold great art treasures to the Nazis for his own benefit. In order to clear his name, he admitted that the so-called treasures were fakes that he painted himself, a defense that had far-reaching consequences for him and the art world.

Before the war, Van Meergeren had claimed to find a very valuable picture: The Supper at Ammaus by the great Dutch painter Vermeer. Experts had authenticated his find. But with his subsequent admission that he had faked many old masters during the war, art experts revised their view and condemned the Vermeer as a fake and accused Van Meergeren of being the faker. He was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to prison. He died soon after.

Robertson Davies is interested in this story because it exposes how easily art experts can be duped. However, he raises a more interesting idea when he repeats a question Van Meergeren asked during his trial: "Yesterday, this picture was worth millions of guilders and experts and art lovers would come from all over the world and pay money to see it. Today, it is worth nothing, and nobody would cross the street to see it for free. But the picture has not changed. What has?" Nobody could be bothered to answer the question at his trial. The absence of an answer appears to suggest that the question is rhetorical; nothing, of course, had changed with the painting.

Davies quotes one art critic who later tried to answer the question about the fake by saying, "The magic has gone out of it." What does this mean? Unfortunately, Davies does not elaborate. The magic in this case is certainly one of history. The painting is part of our history. Like the first edition of a book, that history contains all our dreams—and in those dreams are embedded all our archetypes, with all our fears and loves.

Why are these ideas so important to the argument over the Torah's divinity? There are those who would like us to accept the Torah as a great work because of its own intrinsic qualities, rather than because of its divine origins. Like Van Meergeren, they ask us to value the painting as though it were a Vermeer even when it was painted by another. The great refinement of the Torah's ethical code, its highly advanced legal system, and the genius of its wisdom may attract the praise and even envy of the connoisseur—but to deny its Heavenly origins is to take the magic out of it.

Love of Torah cannot be divorced from its origins, or rather, from how it was given to us. Written by man, inspired by G-d, is not good enough. Given by G-d through the hands of His servant Moses is our history. And in that history lies the magic of Torah.

Freedom Echoes Across Himalayas

Singing around a bonfire 20,000 feet up in the mountains is not the image most of us have of a Seder. But for a large group of the approximately 3,000 Israelis who backpack across the dazzling Himalayan mountains, it just doesn't get any better.

Eleven years ago news of these young people, stranded during Passover in a region with no resident Jewish community, reached the Lubavitcher Rebbe—a group of student rabbis were on the next plane to Nepal. Today the Chabad Seder in Kathmandu attracts upwards of 1,200 people each year, making it the largest in the world.

"The synagogue is not necessarily where Jewish kids are hanging out these days," says Rabbi Asi Spiegel. "If searching for Chametz means cleaning out your backpack, great! What's important is that they want to connect with the Exodus. That's why we're here.

"The funny thing is, most of our guests say they rarely set foot in a temple back home. But they're here, connecting with the Passover experience. And loving every minute of it, in the last place you'd ever expect. It's really awesome," Spiegel concludes.

So moving that a feature length documentary about the Seder is set to air on Israeli television later this month.

Yo Quero Matza

The narrow streets leading to Centro S. Israelita de Baja California, the Chabad center in Tijuana, Mexico, are jammed with vendors hawking fish tacos, carne asada and bright beads. Yet once you enter the modest building and hear children singing Hebrew songs with a Spanish accent, you know you've arrived at the gateway between Mexican culture and traditional Judaism.

The worlds began to merge eight years ago when Chabad Lubavitch sent an Argentinean rabbinical student, Mendel J. Polichenco, to "TJ" for the summer to help fortify the sparse Jewish community. By fall, the people asked if he could possibly stay.

Today Rabbi Polichenco and his wife Dini head a growing congregation and a fully accredited Day School where students study in Spanish, Hebrew and English.

"These are some of the most welcoming people I have ever met," notes Rabbi Polichenco. "But the challenge of providing a strong sense of Jewish identity has been significant." Indeed, there are few signs of Judaism in this predominately Catholic country. Rebbetzin Dini says the Polichencos (including two year old Avraham Yosef), "interact with people on a family level, not only as an organization."

The approach has worked so well that several communities throughout Mexico have requested Chabad's assistance. In response, West Coast Chabad has launched plans to open outreach centers in Mexico City and in other key locations.

PRIMO ...at Basics

LASAGNE ALLA CARNE

12	Primo Lasagne Noodles
1 lb (500 g)	Lean Ground Beef
1	Medium Onion
1	Clove Garlic, Minced
1 can (156 mL)	Primo Thick & Zesty Original Pasta Sauce
1 can (156 mL)	Primo Tomato Paste
1 cup (250 mL)	Water
1 pkg (475 g)	Silani Riccota
2	Eggs, Lightly Beaten
4 cups (1 L)	Silani Shredded Mozzarella Cheese
1/2 cup (125 mL)	Silani 100% Grated Parmesan Cheese

For best results cook Primo Lasagne Noodles as suggested on package. In large frying pan, brown meat, onion and garlic. Drain fat. Add pasta sauce, tomato paste and water. Bring to boil; simmer while lasagne cooks. Blend ricotta cheese with eggs. Spread thin layer meat sauce in bottom of greased 13x9x2" (33x23x5 cm) baking pan. Top with 1 layer of 4 lasagne noodles, overlay edges slightly. Top with 1/3 meat sauce and 1/2 each ricotta mixture and mozzarella cheese. Repeat layers. Top with last 4 noodles, remaining meat sauce and parmesan cheese. Bake in 350°F (180°C) oven for 30-35 minutes. Let stand 10 minutes before serving. Makes 6-8 servings.

Young students from Or Haemet Sephardic School in Thornhill, Ontario taking part in a special Sephardic Lifecycle program.

Our hearts must not harden

The photographs on this page are piercing reminders of our responsibilities as Jews and as human beings. Our hearts rise at the sight of the beautiful young children – our children – from Or Haemet Sephardic School in Thornhill, Ont., so delightfully gowned in the colours and costumes of their parents' and grandparents' traditions. Conversely, our hearts fall at the sight of the needy, elderly man in the Ukraine, who, probably hungry, holds tenderly but fast to his "bread of affliction," lest it slip from his grasp and crumble, like so many of the traditions of his parents and grandparents torn from him by the former regime.

The polarity of the photos is compelling, and on this holiday, so graphic a representation of what we are bidden to recall.

Passover demands of us that we raise our children to remember the old man, his distress, his dignity. Thus, it is no mere stylistic device that the retelling of the exodus at the seder begins with:

"This is the bread of affliction that our ancestors ate in the land of Egypt. Whoever is hungry should come and eat; whoever is in need, should come and celebrate Pesach."

The story we will tell around the table is the story of who we are and we were forever intended to be: a people that accepts upon ourselves as existentially necessary and just, the bearing of responsibility, one for the other.

Swept away by his arrogance and by the brutality of his power, Pharaoh's heart hardened against decency, compassion and the suffering of others.

But our hearts must never harden to the suffering of others.

We therefore thank God for sustaining us and bringing us to a new Passover so that we can delight in the holiday, marvel at God's miracles and teach the message of compassion and decency to our own children.

Happy and Healthy Passover

The News in Brief

CANADA

Yom Hashoah Day

VICTORIA — British Columbia will soon join other provinces in officially marking Yom Hashoah. Last week, the legislature introduced an act to proclaim Yom Hashoah as an official day of Holocaust remembrance and memorial.

ISRAEL

Case Adjourns

JERUSALEM — After little more than two hours, Israel's Supreme Court last week abruptly adjourned deliberations on the bitterly disputed question of whether the state should recognize non-Orthodox conversions to Judaism performed in Israel. The petitioners from the Reform and Conservative movements suggested the judges might be trying to delay the case in the hope the controversy would be resolved outside the courts.

Circumcision Case

JERUSALEM — Israel's Reform movement has petitioned the courts to order the minister of health to change a policy allowing only Orthodox-performed circumcisions in hospitals. The petition was filed on behalf of a clinic that employs doctors who perform circumcisions for individuals who want a non-Orthodox ceremony or who require circumcision for medical reasons.

Dispute over Wagner

JERUSALEM — Holocaust survivors in Israel have criticized a decision by the Israel Symphony Orchestra to play music by the German composer Richard Wagner during a performance in October. In 1991, the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra cancelled a performance of music by Adolf Hitler's favorite composer, after subscribers protested.

Jews 'Disappeared'

JERUSALEM — Israel is pressing Argentina to investigate the disappearance of thousands of Jews during the 1976-83 military dictatorship. Visiting Buenos Aires, Israel's deputy foreign minister said he raised the issue with Argentine President Fernando de la Rua. Human rights groups estimate that some 30,000 leftists and dissidents vanished after being detained by the military junta. Of these, 2,000 were Jewish, according to Israel-based groups.

WORLD

Offer For Parents

BERNE — Switzerland is offering to pay $76,000 (US) to a Jewish man whose parents were murdered in Auschwitz after Swiss authorities deported them in 1942. The Swiss government's offer to Charles Sonabend, a 69-year-old London resident, is not an admission of wrongdoing, stressed a government spokesperson.

WASHINGTON — Two members of the U.S. House of Representatives have introduced a resolution calling for the admission of Israel's Magen David Adom Society as a full member of the Red Cross. The congressmen said the agency is a victim of politics and should be allowed to use the Star of David as its symbol.

Looted Art Web Site

BERLIN — Germany has launched a Web site to help Holocaust victims and their heirs find Nazi-looted art. The site, located at www.lostart.de, has searchable listings in German and English, and will eventually add Russian.

Court: Israel Cannot Detain Lebanese

JERUSALEM — In a decision hailed by human rights groups but attacked by the family of an Israeli MIA, Israel's High Court of Justice last week ruled that the state cannot hold a group of Lebanese nationals as bargaining chips.

In a 6-3 decision, the Court ordered the immediate release of eight Lebanese who have been held in Israel without trial.

The Court said Israel cannot keep a person under administrative detention if the individual does not pose a threat to state security. The court found that the eight prisoners, some of whom have been held for 14 years, did not pose such a threat. It was not immediately clear whether the ruling applied to seven other Lebanese prisoners who were not included in the petition submitted to the court.

These include the two most prominent detainees who have been held by Israel as bargaining chips for the return of Israeli airman navigator Ron Arad, who bailed out of his fighter plane over Lebanon in 1986 and is believed to have been held by pro-Iranian troops there.

Arad's mother condemned the decision, and said the court had "betrayed" her son.

CORRECTION

The story "Jurists meeting in Canada" (CJN, April 13, page 1) incorrectly identified the position of Prof. Irving Abella at York University. Abella holds the J. Richard Shiff Chair for the study of Canadian Jewry. Michael Brown is the director of Judaic studies at York. CJN regrets the error.

Jewish leaders unconcerned over PM's 'gaffes'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prime Minister's Jean Chrétien's trip to the Middle East may have generated headlines of gaffes and diplomatic foul-ups here at home, but two Canadian Jewish community officials who accompanied Chrétien on the Israel leg of the 12-day journey returned last week wondering what all the fuss was about.

In fact, they give the prime minister high marks for a positive mission to Israel and believe that whatever Chrétien may have said or done it will not damage Canada-Israel relations or affect Canada's image in the Mideast.

In the end, journalists and opposition politicians seemed more worried about the fallout over Chrétien's perceived missteps than did the policy-makers whose job it is to ensure that Canada and Israel remain on good terms.

"Everything the prime minister said is consistent with Canadian foreign policy," said Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen, who accompanied Chrétien to Israel. "He's getting an unfairly critical ride from the press here."

Ronen described Chrétien's visit to Israel, the first ever by a Canadian prime minister, as "important and successful," adding he's "not concerned" that Chrétien's remarks will change Ottawa's view of Israel, or vice-versa.

However, "because of the reaction [to the remarks] here at home, it's important he clarify that policy," Ronen added.

The reaction took the form of scathing headlines. They included "Chrétien blunders into peace process" and "PM commits yet another Mideast gaffe" and "Clueless in Gaza." The National Post openly stated there was "policy chaos" as the "PM stumbles again."

That alarm did not seem to perturb Rob Ritter, executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee, who also accompanied Chrétien to Israel.

"Most" Jewish communal leaders who went along felt the prime minister's trip was "a good encounter between Canada and Israel, and that good things happened," Ritter said. "There was a very clear, positive chemistry" between Chrétien and his Israeli counterpart, Ehud Barak, Ritter said.

From the editor's desk

They were 10 cousins, The oldest was almost 13; the youngest, almost four, eight boys, two girls. Somehow, they all seemed to fit at one end of a makeshift table that filled the entire length of the kitchen.

To a youngster seven years old, the kitchen seemed, like all kitchens, large enough to accommodate the 20 people who crowded around the table.

The Kelvinator fridge stood at one corner of the room, at the joining of the wall opposite the table perhaps 10 feet away, and the wall between the kitchen and the summer kitchen.

In fact he never did understand why that smaller room attached to the kitchen was called a summer kitchen. No one ate there at any time, let alone in the summer. It was poorly lit, damp and cold, and used mainly as a gigantic storehouse in which cans of food and other household supplies were stacked in jumbled asymmetry on home-made shelves lined with wax paper.

One walked through the summer kitchen and down the four or five wooden steps to get into the backyard, a small postcard patch of concrete and grass, the escape route to the laneway behind the house, the paradise of all playgrounds for the 10 cousins and their many friends.

At the other end of the table and around its middle, sat their parents and grandparents.

Grandfather sat at the head of the table. Although he was not a stern man, he had a stern bearing, probably as a result of his slow gait, his ramrod straight-backed posture and the way he spoke. Even though he was essentially deaf in one ear, he generally spoke quietly.

To a youngster of seven years old, grandfather was the embodiment of authority.

No one challenged his will; no one countermanded his instructions; no one questioned his advice; certainly not any of the grandchildren.

Sitting beside grandfather, on his right, was his son, the seven-year-old's uncle. To grandfather's left sat one of the three sons-in-law, the seven-year-old's father.

The other aunts and uncles found their places around the table. Grandmother, two of her three daughters, her son and daughter-in-law sat on the side of the table closest to the fridge, the stove, the sink, the counter and the cupboards. The seven-year-old's mother sat beside her husband.

That specific night, the cousins did not charge through the summer kitchen to get to their fantastical laneway. They spent the entire evening inside.

It was Pesach. The extended family had gathered at the bubbeh's and zideh's house for the seder.

More than four decades later, when the seven-year-old was himself a parent, and he missed his own father, and he wanted to "see" again some of the images of his father as a young man, he recalled the smells and the sounds and the sights of the seders at his grandparents' home – a narrow, two-storey, semi-detached home in the "greener" immigrant neighbourhood of downtown Toronto.

How did we all fit into that kitchen? he wondered bemusedly. How did we not bump into each other whenever we tried to move? How did we have room even to bring the spoonfuls of chicken soup to our mouths without splashing the person next to us?

Though he carefully and lovingly peeled back more of the layers of his memory, he could not remember any scenes of bumping or splashing.

But the echo chambers of his mind did bring back to him the "noise" of the kitchen/dining room.

It was always more than a din and never less than a commotion. Had there been a noisometer in the room, it would have surely been stuck between ruckus and hubbub. How could it have been otherwise? At one end of the table were the 10 young cousins; at the other end of the table were the 10 adults: grandparents and parents.

Because grandfather was essentially deaf in one ear, the adults spoke rather loudly; and because the adults spoke rather loudly, the cousins, simply to hear each other better, spoke even more loudly than their parents.

Adding colour to the volume of the sound was the cacophony of four different languages. The cousins spoke to each other in English, the adults spoke to each other in Yiddish. The adults spoke to their children in Yiddinglish; the children answered them in Engliddish.

But that was only during the meal part of the seder. During the narrative of the exodus, there was only one language: the heavily Polish-accented pronunciation of the Hebrew of the Haggadah, and there was only one sound: the familiar, comforting, sweetly melancholy tenor voice of the seven-year-old's father leading the family in the recitation of the story.

The boy never asked why his father led the recitation/singing. It seemed only natural and right. His father, after all, was a marvellous singer. He had the finest voice of anyone in the family. He loved to sing. But more important, it was obvious even to the seven-year-old, that his father needed to sing.

Many years passed before the seven-year-old was able to see the images of his young father in their truer dimension. He finally "saw" that his father, and other sole "survivors" like him, were also remembering as they sang at the seder.

His father was also searching for images of a younger past. But his memories, barely more than a decade old when his son was seven, could not comfort. They still cut him deeply, the dull edge of recollection's blade piercing his psyche and stabbing at his heart even as his sweet voice became part of the din of the seder in a new life in a new land. MBD

Nisan declared Agunot month

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The month of Nisan has been declared Freedom for Agunot month by L'maan B'nos Yisrael International, an organization dedicated to helping the plight of agunot.

Mattie Klein, founder and president of the New York-based organization said that "Pesach is a time for celebrating our freedom...We cannot sit comfortably at our seder when so many of our Jewish daughters are denied their basic right of freedom to remarry because they are agunot," she said by telephone from New York.

Batei din will be ready and prepared in various locations in the United States and Canada to facilitate the get process, and L'maan B'nos Yisrael will cover the cost of the sofer, said Klein.

A conference dealing with the agunah crisis is planned for May 21 at Yeshivah of Flatbush, in New York, she said. Keynote speaker is Rabbi Eliyahu Ben-Dahan, general director of the rabbinical courts of Israel.

"The conference is historic in the sense that many prominent rabbis are giving their time to speak in support of women and children.

"Their understanding of this problem is a credit to the women who have stayed loyal to Judaism under such conditions," said Klein.

Also speaking at the conference will be Rabbi Kenneth Auman of Young Israel of Flatbush; Rabbi Herschel Schachter, rosh hakolel of Marcos and Adina Katz Kolel of RIETS, Yeshiva University; Rabbi Elazar Teitz of Elizabeth, N.J.; Rabbi Mordechai Tendler of Kehilat New Hempstead; Rabbi Mordechai Willig, rosh yeshiva, RIETS, Yeshiva University and rabbi of Young Israel of Riverdale; and Klein.

Unity sought on funding

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Representatives of Jewish day schools in Ontario agreed last week to put aside old animosities and form a new, united front to press the government for public funds.

In a two-hour town hall meeting last Thursday night lay leaders, professional educators and members of parents' groups came together to end the splintering of activity and form one, united voice in the fight for funding.

The parties agreed that until the new group has formed a mandate, all other activity and pressure tactics will cease. A steering committee, under the chairmanship of former day school principal Yisroel Janowski, has given itself until Shavuoth (June 9) to articulate a mandate and come up with a budget.

The new group is designed to unite all the various organizations that have formed since February, when the United Nations found that Ontario's policy of funding Catholic schools but not other religious-based education is discriminatory.

Since then, a number of groups has sprung up. There's Ontario Parents for Equality in Education Funding (OPEEF); Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF); Parents for Educational Choice, and the Ontario Alliance of Jewish Schools (OAJS). The multi-faith Coalition for Justice in Educational Funding included Canadian Jewish Congress.

They joined the 16-year-old Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE), an arm of Congress, in lobbying Queen's Park for tax dollars for Jewish day schools.

In the past, the established community has subtly attempted to bring the OAJS into line. In a letter last October to the fledgling group, founded on principles of independence, Seymour Epstein, executive director of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education, wrote: "I am pleased to note that you are also involved in OJAEE in a complementary fashion."

In February, Shirley Worth, chair of the Board of Jewish Education, wrote members of OJAEE, noting that an unauthorized letter had gone out asking them to join the OAJS. "Unfortunately," Worth wrote, the letters had not been "previously discussed" with OJAEE, the board or Congress.

Last Thursday's meeting, moderated by Epstein, sought to bury hatchets as much as to promote community solidarity.

"It's important we forget about the past," Epstein said, referring to the back-biting among the various groups as to which is truly representative. "We're here to correct a terrible injustice in Ontario."

Epstein noted he couldn't remember a time when representatives of all day schools in Ontario, ranging from Reform to chassidic, sat in the same room.

But repeatedly, several in attendance wondered why it was necessary to re-invent the wheel, as OJAEE has been around since 1984, and has the clout of Congress behind it; and OAJS was formed by parents from 27 day schools.

Others argued it was important to form a single voice that will wed the grassroots to the Jewish establishment.

Mainly, the evening provided the opportunity to air ideas.

John Syrtash, representing B'nai Brith Canada, said the task at hand is to bend public opinion toward the view that independent schools deserve public funding, so that the government would follow. He suggested hiring a media consultant to blitz the public with advertising.

But Georganne Burke, who helped found the OAJS, said the only tactic that will work is to lobby individual MPPs, especially those with large Jewish constituencies, "because the most important thing for them is to be re-elected."

Keith Landy, chair of Congress's Ontario region, said the current government offers "the best chance" for funding, so pressure must reach its peak in the next few years. He said short-, medium- and long-term strategies must be developed.

Landy said he thought the formation of OAJS was "premature" and that the group has "no real purpose." As for swaying public opinion, he cited the results of a recent poll that found 54 percent of Ontarians already favour extending public funds to private, religious-based schools.

Several others said they thought any new group must be independent. Henry Koschitzky, chair of OJAEE, wondered aloud what the new organization should be independent of.

The steering committee consists of representatives from OJAEE, Congress, B'nai Brith, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), small communities and parents.

A hope and a prayer

The trial of the "Iranian 13" began last week and was adjourned to May 1, ostensibly, Iranian media reported, out of respect for the Passover holiday. More likely though, the postponement was a ploy, a cynical public relations bone thrown to an increasingly justice-hungry West. After all, the justice officials must have thought, the harm to Iranian justice in waiting two more weeks is probably minimal: The charges were laid more than a year and a half ago anyway; ten of the accused have been locked in jail since they were charged; and in any event, the authorities probably feel "confident" about the outcome.

Last week there were rumours that four of the accused had "confessed" to the charges. We are not surprised at the rumours. Who knows what conditions the imprisoned men had to endure? For that matter, who knows to what behaviour they may have "confessed" – a letter to a loved one in Israel, a phone call, simply asking after the news?

But, though not surprised, we are alarmed nevertheless. It may be a chilling precursor to a chilling process.

Only grudgingly did Iranian justice officials finally allow the accused to choose their own counsel. Counsel were then given but a few hours to prepare for the proceedings. And the proceedings were conducted in secret, behind closed doors. Observers were barred from the court.

For the Jews of Iran this year, Passover will be more than a sacred ritual of retelling, reliving and rejoicing in our ancestors' freedom from ancient Egyptian oppression. It will be a hope and prayer.

And for their co-religionists around the world – us – the cry "let my people go" will be more than a theme-binding memory to kinship. It will and must also be a rallying cry.

Truth over falsehood

British High Court Judge Charles Gray ruled without qualifier or compunction: "It appears to be incontrovertible that Irving qualifies as a Holocaust denier." With that succinct declaration, he dismissed David Irving's defamation lawsuit against American historian Deborah Lipstadt. "For his own ideological reasons," Gray wrote, "[Irving] persistently and deliberately misrepresented historical evidence." He also branded Irving a racist, an anti-Semite and an associate of neo-Nazis.

Thus ended, last week, the latest high profile, public battle between the forces of falsehood and evil against the forces of truth and good. Thankfully, truth and good triumphed.

We must, however, remain constantly vigilant that they always will.

CAPTIVE IN IRAN

The government of Iran still holds the following members of the Jewish community as prisoners. Each is a universe of life and existence unto his own. And each has a name. Let us not forget them.

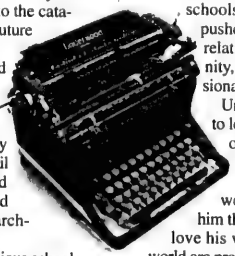
Must stop culture war

The strident polemic of Rabbi Barry Gelman (CJN, March 30) and his condemnation of Chief Rabbi Ovadia Yosef for his vehement attack against Yossi Sarid, Israeli minister of education, does very little to clarify this occurrence but most certainly adds fuel to the catastrophic culture war that threatens the future of the State of Israel.



Rabbi Gelman's indignation is shared by the media, who do not fail, at every opportunity, to stoke the fires of controversy between the haredi and the secular. A balanced and intellectually honest journalism would certainly not fail to accurately detail what Sarid has said and done that justifies his being compared to Haman and Amalek, the historic archenemies of the Jewish people.

Sarid closed numerous Sephardi religious schools, depriving hundreds of Sephardi children of their education and social assistance. He has gutted the previous curriculum of Jewish awareness in the government school system and has substituted the new revisionism, which negates the historic Jewish claims to Israel and identifies the early chalutzim as colonialist interlopers and usurpers of the land, a page out of Yasser Arafat's propaganda and lies.

Sarid has evoked the anger and resentment of the religious Zionist and haredi groups by awarding the Israeli Prize to Shulamit Aloni, who throughout her lifetime has vilified religious Jewry and even the most patriotic segment of the Israeli community by advocating that the hesder members of the religious Zionist movement be dismissed from the army, questioning their loyalty.

As reported in the press, Sarid was the first cabinet minister to taunt and boast in the Knesset that he does his best official business on the Sabbath.

He has continued to foster distrust and antagonism for the religious segment of Israeli Society. Since the tragic assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, Sarid has done everything in his power to demonize the Israeli right as terrorists and assassins.

At this critical time, what is called for is a cessation of acrimonious hostilities and an international Jewish conclave to seek a resolution to this cultural civil war that is tearing apart the fabric of Israeli society and is ominously threatening the very existence of the State of Israel.

Many of the intellectually dishonest Israeli media, craven politicians and elitist and partisan jurists have brought about this debacle of dialogue that we must all deplore and that places 50 years of Jewish creativity and accomplishment in dire jeopardy. Let us stop the finger-pointing and start holding hands, lowering the rhetoric and modifying the recriminations.

Responding to Rabbi Uri Zohar

Re: "Uri Zohar: From media star to Torah scholar" (CJN, March 23). Telling us that children in "secular" schools do not learn the Bible, children are pushed to use drugs, true family and human relationship do not exist in secular community, and so on, is cheap, unintelligent, missionary propaganda.

Uri Zohar tells us that he did not know how to love and respect his wife until he became observant, but we should remember that he was a part of a bohemian artists group to whom the words drugs and free sex were not unknown. I am very happy for him that finally he learned how to respect and love his wife, but many other Jews around the world are practising happy marriage without going to shul every Shabbat.

Israel is and will always be the Jewish state even though a majority of the Jews living there consider themselves secular or at least non-Orthodox.

As to the Jewish education Rabbi Zohar claims doesn't exist in secular school in Israel, I can give him no better example than my daughter, who came to Canada a few months ago after graduating fifth grade in a public school in Israel and in her first months in Canada, reached the national finals in the Bible contest held here.

The main difference between the haredi education stream to which Rabbi Zohar sends his children and the regular secular education system in Israel is that in the latter, children are also allowed to learn mathematics and other sciences that are banned in the haredi stream.

Flat tire on Jewish highway

I have been collecting Mark Mietkiewicz' columns on Jewish sources on the Internet for a long time, in anticipation of using them when I can/need to.

His column of March 30, "More Jewish Humour," professes to present a story in Yiddish. I read it two, three times. Where's the Yiddish? I assumed it was German. I consulted my resident Yiddish expert – my wife, a Yiddish teacher for many years, who also has a knowledge of German. There is not one word of Yiddish in the story! Perhaps it is a broken, mangled German.

Mark: keep up the good work – but please check your sources a bit better and/or consult those who really know, when appropriate.

Passover customs differ around the world

By RAHEL MUSLEAH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Jews all over the world conduct a seder for Passover with the Haggadah as their "instruction manual." The words may be familiar, and certain rituals universal, but customs vary from country to country. Different melodies, and special foods impart a distinctive flair to Passover traditions from Portugal to Persia.

At my Passover seder, for example, which follows the traditions of the Jews of Indian-Iraqi-Syrian ancestry, we chant each paragraph of the Haggadah in both Hebrew and Judeo-Arabic, a combination of Hebrew and Arabic.

We use a thick date syrup called halek for charoset; celery leaves instead of parsley for karpas; and lemon juice instead of salt water.

Sephardi communities often share similar Pesach customs, although they vary in nuance by country. Foods, especially, were influenced by what was available locally, as well as by regional culinary traditions.

Here is a sampler of different customs and foods that might whet your appetite to add creativity to your own seder, compiled from my own traditions, kosher ethnic cookbooks and Rabbi Herbert Dobrinsky's A Treasury of Sephardic Laws and Customs (Yeshiva University/Ktav).

All seder plates must include the shankbone (zero'a), egg (betzah), bitter herbs (maror), charoset, green vegetable (karpas), and a second green vegetable (chazeret). Three matzot and a liquid for dipping – either salt water, lemon juice or vinegar – stand outside the plate.

As is my custom, many Sephardi families use romaine lettuce for maror and celery leaves for karpas. Before boxed matzah was readily available, some communities baked a thick pita-like matzah for the seder and a wafer-thin variety for the rest of the week.

The one element that changes most from community to community is the recipe for charoset, which symbolizes the mortar the Israelites used to make bricks. Charoset is usually sweet, often made in large quantities and eaten for breakfast, even lunch and dinner, throughout the week of Passover. But the recipe most of us are familiar with – chopped apples, walnuts, sweet wine and cinnamon – is hardly set is stone.

In my family, charoset is made from boiling dates until they are reduced to a thick liquid, straining them, then adding chopped walnuts.

Persian communities mix spices with over a dozen kinds of fruits and nuts, including dates, pomegranates, bananas, oranges and pistachios. Venetian Jews blend chestnut paste and apricots.

Only a few communities temper the pleasant flavour of charoset: The Greek Jews of Zakynthos mash raisins in vinegar, and add pinches of pepper and finely ground brick! Yemenite Jews use chopped dates and figs, chili pepper and spicy coriander.

The Haggadah, recited in Hebrew as well as the local vernacular, whether it was Ladino (Spanish and Hebrew), French or Arabic, highlights the concept that each person should feel as if he or she were leaving Egypt. A custom I'm particularly fond of – common among Sephardi and Mizrachi Jews – helps reenact the exodus.

We tie the afikoman in a large napkin and give it to one of the children, who slings it from his or her shoulders.

Two distinct passover customs: A European family in Hungary, and a Yemenite family in Israel. [Israel photos]

The leader asks a series of three questions: "From where have you come?"

"From Egypt," the child answers.

"Where are you going?" the leader asks.

"To Jerusalem," the child answers.

"What are you taking with you?" the leader asks.

The child points to the sack of matzah. Everyone bursts into the singing of Mah Nishtanah, the Four Questions, which is not reserved for the youngest child alone.

The questions also follow a different order. First, we ask, "Why do we dip twice?" which is the third question according to Ashkenazi custom, and then "Why do we eat matzah? Why maror? Why do we recline?"

Moroccan Jews hold the seder tray aloft and pass it over the heads of everyone at the table, proclaiming that they have left Egypt and are now free. Persian Jews beat each other lightly on the back and shoulders with bunches of scallions or leeks when they chant Dayenu, to symbolize the sting of the taskmaster's whip.

In many Ashkenazi homes, when the 10 plagues are recited, each person dips a pinky in the wine and diminishes it by 10 drops. In some Sephardi homes, it is only the leader who recites the plagues so that others will not be "contaminated." In my house, the leader empties a special cup of wine into a bowl, then washes his or her hands. Among some Levantine and Balkan Jews (from Turkey, for instance), nobody even looks at the wine that is spilled out.

While Sephardi Jews do not usually have a Cup of Elijah or hide the afikoman, symbols from the seder plate are transformed into good omens for year-round protection against the evil eye.

The Bene Israel Jews, in the villages around Bombay, still dip a hand in sheep's blood, impress it on a sheet of paper, then hang it above the doorway as a hamsa, the symbolic, protective hand of God.

Moroccan Jews follow a similar tradition, but with charoset instead of blood. They also strip the shankbone of meat after the seders and leave it in the cupboard all year as a good luck omen. My family stashes away a piece of afikoman – an unusually crunchy amulet! We've even been known to take that afikoman on plane rides to make sure we leave and arrive in safety.

Ashkenazi Jews do not eat legumes (kitniyot), such as rice, corn, beans and peas on Passover, because these products were sometimes ground into flour and baked into bread. To avoid confusion with the grains which are truly chametz, legumes were added to the category of forbidden foods. The practice of Sephardi Jews varies, but many communities do eat rice and other legumes.

Other special Sephardi foods include haminados – eggs boiled with red onion skins, vinegar and saffron; leek croquettes; mina (a vegetable or meat matzah pie); fava bean soup; almond torte and nut cake.

For Sephardi and Mizrachi Jews, Passover celebrations do not end with the seders. In Turkish homes, the father or grandfather throws grass, coins and candy for the children to collect, a symbol of the wealth the Israelites brought out of Egypt (the grass represents the reeds of the Red Sea), and a wish that the year ahead should be "green" and productive.

Probably the best known end-of-Passover celebration is the Moroccan Maimuna, held the day after Passover. During Maimuna, the Arabic word for wealth or good fortune, tables groan with an array of sweets and symbols of good luck. Traditionally a time for matchmaking, Maimuna has become a day for picnicking in Israel today.

As we say in the Iraqi tradition at the end of Passover, sant-il-khadra, a year of good fortune!

Hockey violence

When some 40 years ago I first came to Toronto, watching Hockey Night in Canada was a must at the end of Shabbat. I loved the action, the change from one end of the rink to the other in the batting of an eyelash. I loved the speed and finesse of the players.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Occasionally I went to Maple Leaf Gardens and usually came away enchanted with what I considered a newly discovered aspect of my Toronto habitat.

Alas, those days are over – not because I have become older (I am still a sports lover and always shall be) – but because the game has changed radically. Except for boxing and for wrestling, wilful injury to an opponent is generally a no-no. Once upon a time, hockey belonged to the category of activities where sportsman-like behaviour was a plus and not a minus. The skilful pass and the artistry of the goalkeeper were fun to watch.

But the game has changed, and if tomorrow someone invited me to go to the arena to watch, I would firmly decline – I no longer watch the even most "important" games, such as the Stanley Cup playoffs.

It is a Canadian habit to blame our American neighbours for the spirit of violence that has infected so much of our culture. But hockey is supposed to be the Canadian game, and for once we will have to look to our own house, which badly needs cleaning.

Gone is the skilful stick-handling; now the puck is being shot forward into the corner and the objective is to drive the defending player into the boards as hard and effectively as possible. The hockey czars who have permitted this alteration of the game have no one to blame but themselves for the steadily sinking popularity of what was once Canada's national sport.

I would rather watch the slow but skilful demonstration of good curlers than the raw and often brutal attempts to incapacitate the opposition that hockey now features. Promoters are quite honest about it: You will hear them say that violence sells tickets.

Even in football, the umpires will quickly separate contestants in a potential fight, but in hockey, punching an opponent is considered a semi-legitimate activity, cheered by stupid spectators. Hence the players are now muscular where formerly they were skilful. It is a poor exchange.

Worse, it reflects the further deterioration of our public culture. As long as the owners and other moguls can theorize that violence sells, the public can blame only itself. But empty stadiums and poor TV ratings would quickly bring about a change. We can, if we want, upgrade our culture even in the field of sporting combat, and thereby render a service to all of us.

Chag samayach.

Withdrawal pains

According to Ehud Barak's master plan, the map of the Middle East will be redrawn in less than 90 days. Israel will withdraw unilaterally from Lebanon and, as Shimon Peres said in Ottawa last month, will become the first country in the region to respect Lebanon's territorial integrity.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

The withdrawal will mark the end of a protracted Israeli occupation of southern Lebanon in an effort to secure the safety of its northern settlements from attacks by Hezbollah.

Few people remember today, that Israel first entered Lebanon in 1982 to rout the PLO from its bases in that area. The Lebanon war was a watershed on several counts.

It forced the PLO to re-establish itself in Tunis, far from the borders of Israel, thereby marking its decline both as a potent terrorist force, and as a source of local power for the Palestinians in the territories.

In 1986, the intifada was started by local agitators who challenged the PLO's leadership. In turn, the uprising led Palestinians and Israelis to the negotiating table at the Madrid Conference in 1989, during Yitzhak Shamir's tenure as prime minister.

Lebanon also had a lasting impact on Israeli society. For the first time, the wisdom of going to war openly was challenged by mainstream groups, including reserve soldiers and senior officers.

Twenty years later, much of this appears irrelevant. Today, the players in southern Lebanon are Syria, who claims a stake in that country's future; Hezbollah, supported by Syria and Iran, which uses the area as a launching pad for attacks against IDF soldiers and Israel's north and the SLA, Israel's proxy militia, which by now has its own stake in the future of the south.

For years, traditional security doctrines dictated an Israeli physical presence there to stop missile attacks and infiltration.

The issue was further complicated by Syria's dominant role. While Israel and Syria enjoyed absolute quiet on the Syrian-Israeli lines in the Golan Heights, Syria used Hezbollah as a lever and as its own proxy for raising the stakes in its relationship with Israel.

When Barak pledged to withdraw by July 2000, during the last election campaign, he was not taking a significant electoral risk. Even Ariel Sharon, architect of the controversial invasion and push to Beirut in 1982, had supported the notion of a unilateral withdrawal.

By then, the toll on Israeli soldiers had become intolerable, and the military had recommended alternate methods of securing Israel's north. Again, few remember how the debate over withdrawal unfolded.

Yossi Beilin, now Israel's minister of justice, first floated the then-heretical notion that Israeli soldiers were dying in Lebanon in vain. Colleagues and many in the press branded Beilin – who has often been way ahead of the mainstream in his approach to domestic and foreign policy – a traitor.

In his usual methodical fashion, Beilin worked through a combination of policy research and grassroots support. He backed the fledgling protest group called Four Mothers; who had all lost sons in Lebanon, and who themselves set a precedent in the public nature of their dissent.

Eventually, as the concept of unilateral withdrawal moved to the centre of the political map, what started out as a polarized debate over strategy became a pragmatic debate over tactics.

While Barak's promise gained him electoral support, it has thus far failed to act as a hoped-for lever to budge Hafez al-Assad. As a result, the withdrawal will likely be unilateral, thereby raising a host of questions.

Israel has to determine its security red lines, and it has to contend with the largely moral obligation to the SLA - a creature of its creation.

To generate international support for Israel's approach, Barak is framing the withdrawal within the terms of UN Security Council Resolution 425 which called for restoration of the territorial integrity of Lebanon.

The SLA will be offered a variety of options, including resettlement in northern Israel or monetary compensation. Last but not least, there is the psychological challenge for Israelis. Ironically, what began as the first war to be widely questioned, will be the first withdrawal in Israel's history to be undertaken unilaterally. Although broadly supported, this precedent will leave its mark on the Israeli psyche. In the history of war, there may be glorious battles, but no glorious withdrawals.

Reflections on Passover

Passover is the perfect holiday. It has multiple meanings and functions. Even assimilated Jews find a way to attend a seder. Some Jews vie with each other to see how many guests they can host and how long the seder meal can last.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Passover meets the criteria laid down by sociologist Marshall Sklare for a successful Jewish holiday: It is infrequent, coming once a year. It is child-centred, through rituals like the Four Questions and the hunt for the afikoman. And most important, the holiday can be reinterpreted as a universal celebration of national liberation and the revolt against slavery. (Though, in fact, it was God, not the Jews, who defeated the Egyptians.)

Passover has been anything but static. Take the Haggadah. While for a long time there was one standard text, more and more innovative Haggadot have been written, often to incorporate selected "isms." References are made to other cases of oppression, Jewish and non-Jewish. The various kibbutz movements some time ago introduced their own left-leaning versions, de-emphasizing the religious dimensions of the holiday. Many Haggadot have extensive annotations and commentaries as well.

I confess I am a stick in the mud. My preference is for the older traditional version. I have nothing against participants at a seder adding their own gloss in lively debate. I enjoy it. But I am reluctant to change the original text.

Over the years there has also been a shift away from Hebrew toward using English, as fewer participants are fluent in Hebrew and more and more seders have non-Jewish participants. While I welcome non-Jewish guests at a seder, at my childhood seders a Martian guest would have been as likely to attend.

Even matzah has been transformed. No longer do Jewish palates have to make do with the one traditional variety. Kosher grocery store sections feature shelves groaning under the weight of every conceivable kind of matzah and bread surrogate. Onion matzah, chocolate matzah, garlic matzah, whole-wheat matzah, the list goes on and on. All these innovations take us farther and farther from the "bread of affliction." But like everyone else, I eat them too.

At the same time, Jews are becoming less defensive about eating matzah in public. I remember when I first came to McGill, the Faculty Club was a matzah-free zone. After a couple of years, I decided to change that, by bringing my own supply for the club. I wish I had a dollar for every time non-Jewish friends would comment that they liked matzah. (Of course they did not have to eat it for eight days.)

This is not to say that I am against all forms of change in the seder itself. For years at seders I have attended, I have incorporated elements of minhag Canada. This is of course the unique feature of Canadian seders which inevitably conflicted with Stanley Cup matches involving the Leafs and/or les Canadiens (alas not this year).

Everyone remembers seders past in which the children – and some adults – would excuse themselves and run to a TV set to get the latest hockey update and report back to the others. This tradition is celebrated as the Montreal Seder in a hilarious satire published in The Big Book of Jewish Humour. I recommend it as a wonderful addition to Canadian seders – but not as part of a Haggadah.

One reason for the powerful hold that seders have is familial. People make a supreme effort to assemble with their family, coming from great distances. The fact that there are two seders actually makes life easy for many Jews, who have to juggle competing family obligations. I suspect that many Jews inevitably recall the seders of their youth. I know I do.

There were very few children at my childhood seders. The people present were, like my parents, mainly Holocaust survivors, with few or no children. The Haggadah was read quickly, and in its entirety, in a thick Ashkenazi Hebrew. Most women could therefore not participate. There was animated discussion in a mix of Polish and Yiddish, often linking the passages with political issues of the day. Usually I would fall asleep after the meal, only to be awakened for the search for the afikoman and later by the resounding chorus of Chad Gadyah.

At the time, I thought of the seder as a sort of endurance test. No longer. They are a high point of the year.

To all readers, best wishes for a Happy Passover.

Holocaust denial dealt a blow but not a defeat

David Irving's reputation as a historian, such as it is, lies in tatters this week following a decision by a British judge to dismiss his preposterous libel suit against Deborah Lipstadt and her publisher, Penguin Books.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

We should breathe a sigh of relief that Lipstadt, a reputable American historian, was vindicated. If Irving had won, historical truth would have been smeared with the rank stain of Holocaust denial.

Irving sued Lipstadt because she had the audacity to question two of his major theses in a 1993 book titled Denying the Holocaust. In his subliminal effort to denigrate and mock Jews, Irving made two patently false and outrageous claims. The first was that Jews were not murdered in gas chambers at Auschwitz. The second was that Adolf Hitler did not authorize the mass extermination of European Jewry and that he was only told about the Holocaust in 1943. Irving argued, in Alice-in-Wonderland fashion, that the gas chambers were used solely for the purpose of delousing corpses and that Jews in concentration camps succumbed to a variety of diseases. In a further slap in the face of the facts, he maintained that Josef Goebbels, the propaganda minister, was really behind the Final Solution.

A master manipulator and distorter of reality who can also be judged by the company he keeps, Irving was under the grand delusion that Judge Charles Gray of the High Court in London would actually buy his egregiously faulty theories. But in a stunning rebuke which has set back the unholy cause of Holocaust denial, Gray lambasted Irving for having deliberately distorted historical evidence to serve his ideological ends.

In her book, Lipstadt, a specialist in the Holocaust, wrote that Irving's work was closer to theology and mythology than to history, and that he had skewered documents and misrepresented data in order to reach "historically untenable conclusions." She pointed out that Irving, who has consorted with people like Ernst Zundel, had fabricated his outlandish theory about Auschwitz on the basis of a highly dubious report written by Fred Leuchter, whose dissertation was exposed as a sham, most recently in an excellent documentary film by Errol Morris.

Irving, whose cockeyed theories were music to the ears of anti-Semites, is a dangerous denier precisely because he appeared to be so reasonable and sophisticated an observer of the Third Reich. Indeed, one of his books, Hitler's War, published in 1977, was praised by reviewers for the elegance of its style and the thoroughness of its research.

Unlike some of his fellow revisionists, Irving was smart enough not to deny the undeniable – namely that masses of Jews were killed by the Nazis. "I don't dispute that the Nazis machine-gunned over one million Jews in big killing actions on the eastern front," he said in an interview. Furthermore, Irving acknowledged that Hitler "dehumanized and demonized" Jews and that the crimes he committed "outweigh all the achievements that can be credited to [his] name in the same period."

To someone whose grasp of Hitler and of the Holocaust is shaky, these statements were not beyond the pale. But Irving did not stop there. As he put it: "I don't buy the myth that they [the Nazis] had purposely built factories of death [in Auschwitz] in which millions... were killed, up to a total of six million."

Irving, who contemptuously dismissed the memorial to the dead at Auschwitz as a mere "tourist attraction," traced the origins of "the myth" to an ingenious British psychological warfare plan designed to impugn Germany. Irving sneeringly disparaged credible witness accounts and arrogantly cast aspersions on books about the subject by renowned historians like Raul Hilberg. Irving had a clear agenda – the blatant downplaying of the Holocaust so as to rehabilitate fascism – and he stuck to it ferociously.

Deborah Lipstadt

Irving's contention that Hitler knew nothing about the Holocaust until two years before the end of World War II, and that he never issued a single written order for its implementation, is a prime example of his cynical propensity to mix fact with fiction.

No damning evidence has turned up to refute Irving's argument that Hitler did not order the Holocaust. But is the absence of a smoking gun sufficient reason to let Hitler off the hook, as Irving contends? The answer is a resounding no. Being no fool, Hitler usually issued oral orders to his subordinates. As the first Holocaust denier, Hitler took extraordinary measures to try to conceal the unprecedented atrocities Germany was cold bloodedly perpetrating. And what sane person can believe that Hitler had no knowledge of the 1942 Wannsee conference which sanctioned the systematic destruction of Jews in Europe? We should not forget that Hitler, in his turgid Mein Kampf, fantasized about eradicating the Jewish people and that he publicly threatened Jews with extermination just months before the war broke out. What, apart from sheer anti-Semitic malice, makes Irving think that Hitler was not intent on fulfilling his diabolical threats and schemes?

Irving has been given his comeuppance, but scoundrels like him, from Robert Faurisson to Jim Keegstra, continue to manipulate and misrepresent the truth about one of the central tragedies of our epoch. Holocaust denial has been dealt a decisive body blow, but it has not been defeated. This is no time for complacency. We owe it to ourselves to be vigilant.

Jews in contemporary German cinema

At the best of times, films entertain, enlighten and educate, exerting a fairly profound influence on a culture. In Germany, a country with an immensely troubled history, movies appear to be playing a role, perhaps an important one, in throwing light on at least two extremely sensitive subjects: Jews and the Holocaust. According to Frank Stern, the director of the Centre for German Studies at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, films made in Germany touching on these topics have in fact become quite common.

In a recent talk illustrated with film clips, Stern, the guest speaker at a Goethe Institut forum co-sponsored by the University of Toronto, disclosed that the 1990s produced more German movies than ever before about Jews. As a result, films with strong Jewish themes have moved right into the centre of film culture in Germany.

Some, such as Bronstein's Children and Gloomy Sunday, present Jews in non-stereotyped ways. Others, notably Shalom, My Love, wallow in stereotypical portrayals. Stern, who is writing a book about the topic, mentioned two additional films which have focused on Jews, Jorg Graser's Abraham's Gold and Dani Levi's The Giraffe. The first, set in the 1970s, is a counterpoint to Heimat, the hugely successful television drama which dealt with Jewish matters only glancingly. The second, dubbed Meshugah in the German-language version, concerns a romance shattered by the Nazi past.

Very few of these films ever reach the North American market, and some do not even exist on video. But in Germany, they play to an appreciative audience. Surprisingly, Stern pointed out, German filmmakers have yet to get around to documenting the increasing presence of Russian Jews in Germany's growing Jewish community.

Na'amat leads educational mission

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — According to participants in Na'amat Canada's recent leadership seminar in Israel, the trip was a real eye-opener.

The purpose of the mission, says Lorraine Levene, executive director of Na'amat Canada, Toronto, was to educate future leaders about the organization, and make a connection with Israel. Of the 15 women who took part in the seminar, three – Sue Holtzman, Janis Spinner and Emily Brown – were from Toronto.

Their home base in Israel was the dorm at one of Na'amat's residential schools, the Beba Idelson Agricultural Board High School in Gedera, in the central part of the country.

Holtzman said that a highlight of the trip was getting to know Brig.-Gen. Hedva Almog, president of Na'amat in Israel. "As president of the organization – which is a woman's movement in Israel – and as volunteer deputy mayor of Haifa, Hedva is visible and mainstream."

When people think of Na'amat, which has 300,000 members in Israel, said Spinner, they usually think of day-care centres and vocational schools. "It is actually at the forefront of many social issues."

Recently, said Brown, Almog called on Transportation Minister Itzhak Mordecai, suspected of assaulting a female office worker, to suspend himself until the completion of the investigation. He did eventually step aside.

Na'amat is also fighting to have the mandatory retirement age for women properly enforced, and for people's civil liberties with regards to marriage and burial, she said.

Educate future leaders

The group met with MK Yael Dayan, who is on the threshold of presenting a bill about the retirement issue to the Knesset, said Brown.

Other issues Na'amat has been involved with include the minimum wage law, which was passed in 1992 after a 10-year struggle, and the financial support law, also passed in 1992, which makes it possible for women and children to receive financial support from the National Insurance Institute if the husband or father refuses to support his family.

The agricultural school is made up of students from Israel, Ethiopia and Russia, many of whom come from broken homes, said Brown. "They know it is a Na'amat school, and they are grateful to the organization for giving them the opportunity to upgrade their skills.

The mission also visited a Na'amat day-care centre in Jaffa that took care of Jewish and Arab children, and a community centre in Carmiel where Arab and Druze women spoke about the presence of Na'amat in their villages, said Holtzman. "We were overwhelmed with the impact Na'amat has on the country. Before we arrived in Israel, the organization's work was abstract to us. We are proud to see the scope of its work firsthand.

"The women we spoke to [from the organization] were passionate, concerned and committed – very with it women. Not a week goes by that Hedva is not quoted in the newspaper," she said.

The fact that the group stayed with students rather than in a hotel, made the mission unique, said Brown. "Living among them gave us an entirely different perspective on the country. We were not guests — we were residents."

You've always dreamed of retiring in Israel...
Now, realizing that dream can also be in your best financial interest.

Peace key to Israel's security: former IAF general

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Peace is an essential component of Israel's security, a former general in the Israeli air force said last week.

In arguing his case, Israel Baharav said borders that are the result of negotiations between Israel and its Arab neighbours may actually be safer than those which have been established by military means.

Baharav, who retired in 1993 with the rank of brigadier-general, was chief of IAF intelligence and strategic planning, and is now a member of the directorate of the Council for Peace and Security.

He spoke at Beth Tzedec Congregation. His talk was sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now in conjunction with Israel's consulate general and the World Zionist Organization.

Baharav, who was also Israel's military attaché in Austria and Switzerland, suggested that Israel's new arsenal of precision-guided weapons are an alternative to massively-defended borders.

By virtue of its formidable armed forces, he observed, Israel has the capability of gaining strategic depth.

The Golan Heights are a strategic asset to Israel. But if Israel holds the Golan, Israeli population centres would still be vulnerable to Syria's battery of ballistic missiles.

If negotiations with Israel resume, Syria, for reasons of national prestige, will insist on regaining the Golan in its entirety, Baharav said.

Negotiated borders may be safer: Baharav

And if Ehud Barak, Israel's prime minister, calls a referendum on the fate of the Golan, he will win by a substantial margin, Baharav predicted.

Baharav said that the Arabs, rather than having abandoned their dream of destroying Israel, have realistically accepted Israel's existence.

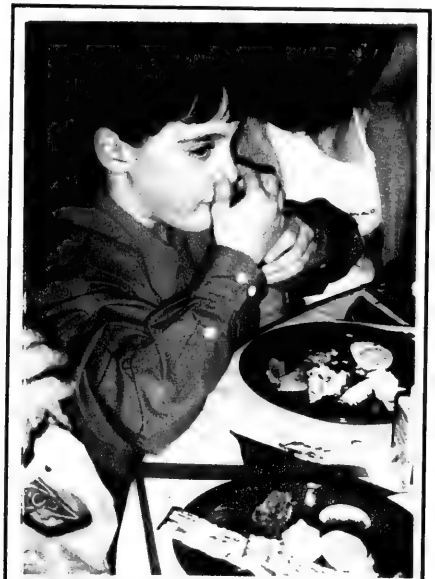
The process began with Egypt's recognition of Israel and accelerated following the 1991 Madrid conference.

Arab acceptance of Israel was the result of at least three factors.

The Arabs concluded that they could not defeat Israel on the battlefield.

With the collapse of the Soviet Union, they lost a powerful patron and supporter, while Israel deepened its alliance with the last remaining superpower, the United States.

The Arabs lost the ability to use oil as a means by which to exert pressure on the United States and western nations.



MODEL SEDER: Associated Hebrew Schools hosted a formal model Passover seder for Danilack campus students, their parents and friends on April 6. The event came in response to the scheduled closing of the elementary department at Danilack in late June. As of September, the campus will house the Associated Middle School. The model seder ran according to Jewish custom, complete with traditional seder foods, such as matzah, the four cups of wine (grape juice for kids), maror, charoset and the like. Students presented creative song, dance and drama segments to highlight portions of the Haggadah. Grade 5 student Brad Fogelman is seen here getting ready to sample the bitter herbs. Speedy solution needed for Ethiopia's Falash Mura: Sharansky

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Memories of Kibur Asres' recent trip to Ethiopia will stay with him forever.

Asres, an Ethiopian Jew who moved to Toronto 18 years ago, returned from a trip to Addis Ababa last month.

Deaths and burials from starvation are part of daily life there, he said.

"I have seen with my own eyes that five to seven people are buried every day in one burial place. This is true in all burial places, including Jewish burial places.

"If you drive in the streets early in the morning, you would see dead people in the corners of buildings and streets."

And then there are the children, Asres said. "I saw children standing in the streets sucking on empty lemon rinds...The sight of mothers and children begging for food is overwhelming. And among them, Jewish kids who should be in schools in Israel."

The Israeli minister of the interior, Natan Sharansky, is currently in Ethiopia investigating the plight of the Falash Mura and their requests to immigrate to Israel.

The Falash Mura are descendants of Jews who converted to Christianity at some point, said Prof. Steven Kaplan, chair of the Institute of African and Asian Studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and author of several books on the history and immigration of Ethiopian Jews.

"They may have converted to gain access to land, to marry Christians or to get jobs," Kaplan said in an interview.

Kibur's father, Qes Asres Yayen, notes in his book, Traditions of the Ethiopian Jews, that the history of Ethiopian Jewry began when the Queen of Sheba returned from her meeting with King Solomon around 1000 BCE.

The queen returned to Ethiopia bearing Solomon's child, Menelik. Also with her were 23 Israelite dignitaries from the court of Solomon.

Qes Asres explains that the dignitaries remained in Ethiopia, and their descendants became known as Beta [house of] Israel.

While the Falash Mura are the members of Beta Israel who have ancestors that converted to Christianity at some point, Asres said, many of them were forced to convert, continued to practise Judaism and didn't intermarry with those around them.

They would have been unaware that they are not considered to be Jews under Israeli law, Asres said.

Kaplan said that in the past, the Falash Mura were located in the Gondar region, but have "migrated either to the city of Gondar itself or to the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa.

"These Falash Mura are living as refugees under very difficult conditions," he said.

Asres estimates that there are approximately 20,000 Falash Mura in Ethiopia currently waiting to emigrate to Israel. Many are separated from family members already living in Israel.

"Brothers and sisters are separated from each other," Asres said.

In 1991, during Operation Solomon, Israel airlifted about 50,000 Ethiopian Jews and gave them full citizenship.

In the meantime, while the government of Ethiopia is faced with drought and famine, as well as an ongoing war with Eritrea, there are 250 to 350 people dying every day, Asres said.

And while the Israeli government sorts out whether the Falash Mura are qualified to immigrate according to the Law of Return, they are allowing but a few Falash Mura to immigrate to Israel.

Kaplan said that "the Falash Mura have their family histories checked to see if they qualify for aliyah as Jews or for entry into the country as relatives of Jews."

He also noted that those favouring the aliyah of the Falash Mura estimate the numbers at about 27,000. However, Kaplan said he believes that "as soon as these are brought to Israel, more will be 'discovered.'

"This has been the pattern in the past and there is no reason to believe that the people who are brought will not also have relatives who want to make aliyah."

Kaplan noted that "those who willingly convert to another religion lose their right to make aliyah according to the Law of Return. However, the law never anticipated that there would be people willing to become Jewish or return to Judaism simply to make aliyah."

According to a report issued by the Israeli Foreign Ministry, Sharansky said the problem of the Falash Mura is a difficult humanitarian problem that must be solved speedily. He promised to streamline the review process for Ethiopians seeking to immigrate to Israel. But he stressed that not all the Falash Mura who claim Jewish roots will be able to come to Israel.

Sharansky himself suffered in Soviet prisons for helping Soviet Jews immigrate to Israel.

"Israel faces a critical moment, with pressures regarding the Law of Return," Sharansky said. "On one hand, there are demands to tighten the law in light of the number of non-Jews arriving in Israel from Russia, while on the other, there are demands to expand the law due to the situation in Ethiopia."

Yet, for Asres, it is a humanitarian matter beyond proportion. People are sick and dying of many diseases – dysentery, cholera and malaria.

It is better to save as many lives as possible by bringing them to Israel, he said, and then sort out the issues of the Law of Return later.

Greater Toronto Area

JIAS co-ordinates immigrant youth project

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A comprehensive program addressing the needs of immigrant youth, in an area of the city populated largely by recent Russian immigrants, is being implemented under the auspices of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS).

Although programs already exist at places like the Bathurst Jewish Centre, the Jewish Russian Community Centre and the Antibes Community Centre, there aren't enough of them, said Perry Romberg, UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto's assistant director of community planning & allocations.

The new initiative will fine-tune existing services as well as introducing new ones, according to a recent news release.

The killing last November of Russian-born teenager Matti Baranovski highlighted some of the issues being addressed and put the project into high gear, said Romberg.

Feeling of not being accepted

The "overwhelming majority" of funding for the project – anticipated at more than $250,000 over the next three years – is being provided by a private donor through the federation, said Romberg, author of A Report on Immigrant Youth Challenges in the Bathurst-Steeles-Finch Corridor, released in February.

The report highlighted issues of concern to immigrant teens and their parents, based on four focus groups with immigrant teens and one with mothers, held over the winter.

Traditionally, JIAS has focused more on families than on youth, said Mila Voihanski, director of immigrant services, who ran the focus groups. In the past decade, however, the number of Russian-speaking youngsters has increased. There are now an estimated 2,000 immigrant teens in the Bathurst-Finch-Steeles corridor.

The parents, who moved here for their children's sake, have become increasingly concerned that their children are segregating themselves and not mixing with Canadian kids, said Voihanski.

Parents would like to see after-school programs for their children, she said. Often teens congregate in places like apartment lobbies, "where they're not supposed to," Voihanski said. "That's how problems start."

Among the teens' concerns, said Jack Kugelmass, executive director of JIAS' Toronto office, is a feeling of not being accepted by the established Jewish community. "They feel that they're not liked, not respected. They feel people are afraid of them, and that many of the existing Jewish organizations don't go out of their way to make them feel comfortable."

A BBYO chapter for Russian teens, created in association with JIAS, is "wonderful," said Voihanski.

Some people might "look askance" at programs that bring Russian youth together exclusively, but people have to feel comfortable, accepted and safe before they will mix, Romberg said.

JIAS also plans to work with other existing organizations to teach them "more about how to relate to a diverse Jewish population. This means that rather than looking at integration as making these people look like us, we have to learn how to accept the newcomer community for what they bring to us."

Most of the teens feel more comfortable with Russian-speaking non-Jews than with Jewish teens who don't speak Russian, Voihanski said. (Programs will be open to Jewish and non-Jewish Russian teens, although there will be a Jewish focus in program content, said Kugelmass.)

The teens want a place to gather and even study that they can feel is their own, but that doesn't mean they don't want Canadian kids to come, Voihanski said.

They also recognize that they need a leader, but "not a psychiatrist or a social worker, just somebody who would help us and be in charge."

Youth unemployment is another pressing concern, because newcomer teens and their parents can't afford much, said Voihanski.

"There's a rich pool of talent out there not being nurtured," said Kugelmass.

JIAS plans include the hiring of outreach workers from the teens' own communities, as well as a focus on investing in youth leadership. Programs should be developed to improve teens' skills, better social relationships and provide academic and job opportunities, according to the report.

Kugelmass believes it is time to "move from the period when we were welcoming [immigrants] to helping to make them stronger and in turn making the whole Jewish community stronger."

"My hope," said Alan Sandler, president of UJA FEDERATION, "is that over the next five years – because I don't think anything is quick – we can teach these children that there is a Jewish community that will accept them and that they will be able to accept and be part of."

Celebrating the Get legislation

PART THREE OF THREE

In the past two weeks, we've examined the implications of Get legislation since its enactment 14 years ago. We've seen how recent decisions have underscored the rights of spouses legitimately seeking a Get and cailed to account their sometimes reluctant and/or vengeful partners.

The future

For spouses who have been badly hurt by the humiliating tactics of such individuals, it may be useful to consider a very new and creative method of at least obtaining some compensation for the suffering. Sue for damages, particularly where there was a prior written agreement in which the husband consented to the Get and failed to honour the deal.

A recent Montreal case has received worldwide attention. Stephanie Brenda Bruker, a former resident, is suing her ex-husband, Jason Benjamin Marcovitz, for $1.35 million in damages in Quebec Superior Court. She claims for emotional distress and breach of contract in a situation where her husband denied her a Get for 15 years after their secular divorce.

This is the first known case in North America where a woman seeks Get-related compensation from a secular Court. Bruker claims that she had to use her personal resources to maintain her lifestyle and that of her two teenage children. As a "chained woman" (agunah) she suffered severe isolation and emotional distress by not being able to remarry ($200,000 claimed), including the loss of consortium ($750,000 claimed), the inability to have more children ($200,000 claimed), and the inability to go on with her life ($200,000).

She claims to have lost the love, affection, moral and financial support that comes with remarriage. Since Mr. Marcovitz's refusal to grant the Get was in breach of a Court order that both parties had agreed upon (i.e. "on consent"), Ms. Bruker does not feel compelled to sue in a Jewish Court; she is merely seeking to enforce the order of the secular Court.

I predict that lawsuits of this kind may become increasingly common, even if there is no prior agreement under which both spouses consented to a Get. For even if one cannot sue for breach of contract, one may possibly still sue for the "tort" of "emotional distress" on its own. This has clearly never been tried before, but then again the Courts have been very sympathetic to Jewish spouses who have been victimized in this manner. Before going this route, you may wish to consult with a Rabbi to ensure that your lawsuit will have the support of the Jewish Court. Normally, all disputes must be heard in a Jewish Court, unless the other party refuses to attend.

Crediting the contributors

We should continue to seek new ways to help the agunah, as well as men who have been denied a Get unfairly. However, let us all celebrate this anniversary and the success of the Get legislation, notwithstanding its limitations in certain situations. And let us remember the individuals and groups which first sponsored the legislation, namely the legion of lobbyists associated with B'nai B'rith Canada and the Orthodox Rabbis of Toronto. We should also acknowledge the support they received from many other organizations and individuals, such as the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Conservative and NDP parties (federal and provincial), and others when this very controversial legislation was first proposed.

The federal government consulted every religious group in Canada before the legislation was passed and it was supported by every group, including the Catholic Church and all Islamic groups. The last fourteen years have shown that Canada has truly much to be proud of in this area.

Now, if we could only turn everyone's attention to the public funding of religious day schools in Ontario...eh?

From my family, the law firm of Basman Smith and B'Nai Brith Canada, we wish you a Happy and Healthy Pesach.

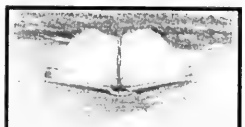
The message of Pesach

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN



Like all Jewish holidays, the holiday of Pesach has not fulfilled its real meaning if it is celebrated only at the seder.

True, the most important mitzvah is the eating of the matzah at the seder, especially as there is no pascal lamb. However, the real message of the holiday of Pesach must be expressed every day to show our gratitude to the Almighty for all the blessings of life. This is done in the many mentions of the exodus from Egypt in our daily prayers, the Kiddush we recite Friday night and on the chagim, as well as in the Birkat Hamazon.

As he or she becomes more powerful and wiser, the truly intelligent human being recognizes that there are limits to what man can do alone. We need each other and the community; and above all, we need to maintain a permanent relationship with God. While we take this for granted, the formal prayer service allows us to express these feelings.

When we recognize that God is the Creator and source of everything, expressing gratitude through prayer should be a very regular form of communication between man and God. Yet prayer is very difficult for many people in our contemporary society, where there is so much emphasis on technology, ambition, mazal and timing.

Many would suggest that prayer ideally is a spontaneous flow of words and feelings coming from the heart and mind. But one would have to be a very gifted and sensitive artist to be able to transfer the feelings of the heart into the words of the mouth.

For most people, it would require an extraordinary event or moment.

This happened when Moses and the Jewish people burst into song spontaneously when they saw the Egyptian army drowning in the Red Sea and the Jews were redeemed and finally freed from bondage. This is how formal and public Jewish prayer began and this song, the Shirah, is recited every day in morning prayers.

At the seder, we also mention in the Haggadah that throughout Jewish history, in every generation there have been attempts to destroy the Jewish people, but the Almighty has saved us. Furthermore, the Haggadah includes passages from the Torah as well as from the Hallel, which we recite in holiday prayer services.

In our individual lives, we begin the day each morning by saying Modeh Ani to teach us not to take for granted the daily happenings of life, good health, the families we enjoy and the material blessings we have and should share with others.

As we celebrate the seder together with our families, let us look forward to justice and brotherhood for all people. In Yiddish, in addition to wishing one another Chag Kasher, we also wish it to be a freilich and joyous holiday for all.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman is rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation in Toronto.

Freedom is a state of mind

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the Torah the readings that describe observance of Passover often centre on children.

We are told, time and again, that when our children ask us what we are doing or why we observe these rituals, we are to answer with various statements.

In fact, in one instance the Torah tells us to tell our children of the exodus from Egypt even if they do not ask – hence we have the child "who does not know how to ask."

With the complex issues of slavery and freedom, both difficult themes requiring mature thinking, why is there so much emphasis on children?

In fact, the seder itself is sparked by questions asked by the children and the entire seder takes the form of the answers we provide them.

We tell them of God's miracles in redeeming us from Egypt and we teach them how the rabbis expound on biblical text to divulge hidden meanings within.

We know of the importance of involving our children in our rituals so they may feel connected and learn, ultimately, to pass this connection onto their own children.

But can we also learn about Passover from our children?

Throughout history Jews have discussed their contemporary challenges at the seder table. Jews oppressed by ancient Rome wished for a redemption that would parallel the one from Egypt and some of their wishes appear in the Haggadah.

Likewise, Jews in the Middle Ages struggled with oppression and dreamed of redemption.

Today we live in a peaceful society and images of slavery seem beyond our realm. The moment we feel we can no longer connect with being enslaved, that is when we must turn to our children.

In raising our children we provide stable structures within which they function. They are told when to go to sleep and when to awake.

We house them in schools for most of their day where they must abide by rules and schedules that are imposed upon them. They must even wait their turn and ask for permission before they are allowed to visit the washroom.

We tell them when they must read and when they must write and teach them to play only when we allow them to. And yet with all these limitations, they miraculously find some way to maintain their joy and excitement.

When they are upset they cry with their whole beings, and when they are happy their laughter ignites all who hear them.

They embody the essence of freedom and they teach us by example consistently each day. Freedom is their state of mind, it underlines everything they do.

The Talmud states that the secrets of the universe reside in the mouths of the very young and that the world itself rests upon the breath of our children.

The Torah has focussed us onto our children when discussing slavery and freedom...and we delude ourselves into thinking we are the teachers.

Jewish Life

Pesach and Prison

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Every Passover, Sid Kleiner spends the holiday with his family – his very extended family. Kleiner packs up his matzahs, kippot and a guitar and goes off to prison. There, he conducts seders for Jewish prisoners to mark Passover, the festival of freedom. So on this Passover eve, a look at the work of these volunteers and at resources on the Internet for people who want to maintain contact with Jews behind bars.

Although Jews constitute a small percentage of the 1.5 million prisoners held in the United States, there are estimates of between 8,000 and 10,000 Jews incarcerated in North America. One of the largest organizations devoted to assisting Jewish prisoners and their families on the outside is the Florida-based Aleph Institute [http://www.aleph-institute.org/]. Since 1981, The Aleph Institute has worked with wardens, chaplains and institutional staff at hundreds of state and federal institutions in a variety of ways to educate them and help them meet the needs of Jewish inmates.

Visiting prisons certainly isn't glamorous, and raising the money to maintain Jewish prison programs isn't easy. You can sense that frustration at the site maintained by Jewish Prisoner Services International [http://www.jewishprisonerservices.org/]. "What a depressing, frustrating, sad commentary that our Jewish community cannot or will not come forward and lend a helping hand to its less fortunate brethren. It really hurts to think of all the mitzvot we could do. Meanwhile, we struggle along with …energy and a sincere dedication to this noble cause."

According to chaplain Gary Friedman, these Jewish programs have gained attention from a wider audience. "We are inundated by non-Jewish inmates asking for Jewish material. There are those who are genuinely interested in converting. But we don't proselytize. We get a lot of strange things, too. Some prisoners get infatuated with Kabbalah (mysticism). Maybe they think they can levitate out of prison."

You can read more about Friedman's work in an article from the Times Record News of Wichita Falls, Tex., [http://www.trnonline.com/today/local/inmates_turning_to_jewish_faith.htm].

You don't have to enter a prison to maintain contact with a Jewish prisoner. JPSI runs a Pen Pal service and has an online application form at its Web site [http://www.jewishprisonerservices.org/PenPalHead.html].

It calls pen-palling safe, pleasant and rewarding, but also offers important advice for anyone interested:

- Do not use your home address.
- Do not send family photos to prisoners.
- Do not ask why a person is in prison.
- It is acceptable to discuss religion, politics and personal philosophies but don't ever proselytize, evangelize or otherwise pressure a pen pal to "see it your way."

Two other sites make for fascinating reading. Chabad of Santa Barbara has designed a handbook for Jewish prisoners explaining what to expect and how to cope with incarceration, anti-Semitism and practising Judaism in prison [http://www.sbchabad.org/sbchabad/prison/]. Correctional Service Canada maintains an interfaith Web site where you can find several essays on Judaism and justice, and selections of prayers geared toward Jewish inmates [http://www.csc-scc.gc.ca/text/forum/rjweek/jew/maine.shtml].

And what do the volunteers get in return for the time spent away from their homes during the holidays? One prisoner wrote this thank you letter after attending a seder: "Passover has been a reminder for me…that I am a human being, that other human beings exist, and that together there can be shared the gift of life in its higher realm" [http://www.hubris.net/bnaibrith.org/ijm/articles/freedom/].

Guest Voices

CAMERA vs CBC

By TAMAR STERNTHAL

More than six months after CAMERA (the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America) contacted CBC about serious errors in a May 1999 report by the Newsworld program, Schlesinger, the network's ombudsman has responded with a lengthy report which is itself marred by distortion and inaccuracy.

The broadcast included a 15-minute segment asserting that the Palestinians "are still largely controlled and subjugated. The Jewish state has frozen or stalled many of its commitments…"

CAMERA pointed out that with Israel's ceding of territory in the West Bank and Gaza, more than 95 percent of Palestinians live under Palestinian administration. The PA controls virtually every aspect of daily life, including schools, hospitals, and civic and political establishments. Palestinians now have passports, a flag, an international airport and a seaport under way. But the CBC ombudsman, David Bazay, ignored without comment this evidence against correspondent Neil Macdonald's charge.

Macdonald also reported that Israel had "decided to rip up thousands of trees [in the West Bank Arab village of Kafr a-Dik] to build a road for the convenience of nearby Jewish settlements."

Israeli officials told CAMERA the number of uprooted trees was 354 – "not thousands" – and many trees were replanted elsewhere for property owners. In addition, Israel offered compensation for losses suffered. CBC omitted all this information, yet Bazay defended Macdonald without reservation.

Bazay similarly shielded Macdonald regarding the purpose of the road, which was in fact constructed for security needs; a young woman had been killed not far away in a drive-by shooting the year before.

When CAMERA challenged the use of "convenience" and its pejorative implication of a frivolous amenity, Bazay was deceptive even about the word's definition.

He claimed the Canadian Oxford Dictionary defines "convenience" as "freedom from difficulty or trouble." But this is a secondary definition; the primary and obvious definition, the one viewers certainly understood, was … "well-suited with respect to facility or ease in use; favourable, easy, or comfortable to use."

Nor was Bazay troubled by CBC's alleged source for its "convenience" claim, Moshe Shimoni, variously identified as a "spokesperson" for the nearby Jewish community of Alei Zahav. But when CAMERA contacted residents of the small community, including the actual secretary, no one had ever heard of Shimoni. The ombudsman ignored this issue entirely.

The May 1999 CBC segment is hardly the only one to warrant concern. A Dec. 29, 1999 report on Israeli water use falsely asserted that "Israelis continue to consume their water … as though they live in Europe." According to the World Resources Institute, Israelis consume 292 cubic metres of water per capita, less than half the European average of 660.

Bazay's response to a CAMERA complaint on this issue elicited more obfuscation. For example, he wrote, as for "domestic use of water in Israel and Europe, Israelis would rank among Europeans who use the least amount of water … When it comes to domestic use, the relatively water-poor Israelis are right up there, in per capita terms" with the Germans, Dutch, Belgians, and others (emphasis added).

How can this be? Israelis are simultaneously the most moderate and most profligate users of water?

Unfortunately, the only consistency in Bazay's review of CBC coverage is his unwavering defence of the network, regardless of material distortions and inexcusable omissions. The bottom line: if you can't trust the CBC to honestly relate what's in the Canadian Oxford Dictionary, when can you trust them?

Technology can be used to improve life: panel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rather than fearing technology, we should learn to harness its power for good, says Marvin Igelman, president and CEO of BrandEra.com, formerly Warp 10 Technologies.

Igelman was part of a panel discussing Technology – Saving Lives or Destroying Souls? at a recent event sponsored by the Sephardi Network of UJA FEDERATION at the Lipa Green building. Joining him were Dr. Zion Sasson, a cardiologist at Mount Sinai Hospital, and Rabbi Yehiel Benayon, spiritual leader of Magen David Sephardic Congregation.

From a medical perspective, technology has had a major impact in saving lives, said Sasson, an associate professor of medicine at the University of Toronto. Twenty-five years ago, a person arriving at the hospital with a heart attack could expect to stay two to four weeks, and had a 20 to 22 percent chance of dying within that time, he noted.

Today, the stay has been reduced to five or six days, with a 94 to 95 percent chance of leaving the hospital alive. "This is not because we're releasing them early," he added.

Because of improved diagnosis and treatment, Sasson said, "in the past five years alone, we have been able to reduce the risk of dying after a heart attack by about 30 percent."

The controversy over technology in medicine, he explained, arises from its potential abuse. Transplants have become less controversial as benefits have become evident, but issues surrounding death as well as testing for genetic predisposition to disease are much more controversial, he said.

"Should we do these tests just to find out?" asked Sasson. "Or only when we have the cure to act on the findings? It's very difficult."

In the case of one of Sasson's patients – an elderly, observant man likely to die within days – Sasson consulted his own rabbi, the patient's family and the patient's rabbi about whether to institute life support as the case progressed.

"It's very difficult. We as physicians deal with this day in and day out."

Active enhancement of death is forbidden, but a patient has the right to refuse medical treatment, said Rabbi Benayon. Each situation warrants its own discussion, he cautioned.

Jews believe that technology and science are part of the wonders of God's world, said the rabbi, citing the precision of the ancient Hebrew calendar and the work of 15th-century Jewish astronomer Avraham Zacuto as examples of the harmony between Judaism and science.

Current examples can be found at Israel's Institute for Torah and Science, where rabbis and scientists have come up with devices like a switch that hospital patients can use on Shabbat to call a nurse, said Rabbi Benayon. They also created a Shabbat phone for former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin to use for matters of state, he added.

"Can I get one?" asked Igelman, a self-described "Mr. Gadget Man" who noted that despite his surname he is Sephardi.

Igelman and Rabbi Benayon also addressed the issue of problematic information being disseminated over the Internet, particularly when children can access it. Both noted the positive Jewish content as well.

But people who see the Internet as a "dangerous and evil force" are missing the point, said Igelman.

"I'm sure these same arguments were made when the Gutenberg press started to produce its first books," he said. "But without that technology, where would we be today? Certainly not better off."

Monitoring Internet content is "not very different from making sure we watch the proper television programs or read suitable material," Igelman said.

"How we use the tools defines whether they're going to make our spiritual and family life better or whether they're going to destroy it."

One day, Igelman predicted, the Internet will be like a movie projector in that it won't be seen as technology but as a tool to bring us the content we choose to receive.

Joan Rivers to headline fund-raising gala

TORONTO — Comedian Joan Rivers comes to Toronto May 25 to headline the Women's Auxiliary fund-raising gala for Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The comedian and best-selling author will take a no-holds-barred approach on aging and how we can fend off its effects for as long as possible.

The timing for Rivers' performance at the Baycrest Gala couldn't be better as she recently published a book on aging. Don't Count the Candles: Just Keep the Fire Lit! (Harper Collins) is an engaging blend of candid revelations, funny anecdotes and quotes, plus Rivers' personal tips for maintaining youth and vitality.

"We are thrilled to have Joan Rivers headline our gala," says Susan Fenwick, event advisor and president of Baycrest's Women's Auxiliary. "She calls life as she sees it, with wit and style. What better topic than aging for our gala patrons who support one of the world's leading centres in geriatric care."

The gala evening is expected to raise $1 million, with proceeds supporting health care programs, services and research at Baycrest.

Only 1,200 tickets are available. Corporate and major sponsor tables for 10 range in price from $10,000 to $50,000, benefactor tables for 10, are $5,000, and patron seating (two tickets) is $1,000. A very limited number of single tickets at $250 are also available.

Rivers will be playing at the Sheraton Centre in Toronto. For ticket information, call 416-785-2500, ext. 2049.

Passover traditions from the artistic community

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's time for spring-cleaning and preparing all those delicious holiday dishes.

Yes, it's time once again to gather around the seder table, to pass on the story of the Exodus. Read on, as these notable people share their holiday plans, and their favourite Pesach memories:

•Actress, writer, producer, Jennifer Podemski is busy travelling, and preparing interviews for her new TV series The Seventh Generation which airs in September, on The Aboriginal People's Television Network (APTN).

Jennifer Podemski

Podemski and her sisters grew up with a Jewish father, and a mother, who is a Saulteaux Indian.

"I'll be travelling around and there's a heartbreaking possibility that I might miss the first seder," Podemski said. "I am just stressing out about it. For me the tradition has always been to go the second night to my best friend Deb's seder…I am going to do my darndest to get back in time for the first one!

"It's a real rebirth for everyone who hasn't been together since Chanukah. If I can't make it, then I will do something, even if it's by myself. If I'm somewhere on location, I might just gather a few friends, whether or not they are Jewish, and read the Haggadah with them.

"When I was growing up, Passover was a big deal. At my grandmother's seder my sisters and I would fight over who set the table, who made the nametags, and who got to sing the Mah Nishtahnah. My favourite thing was definitely all of us singing. Nowadays, since my grandmother passed away, we spend the holiday at my aunt's."

•Popular jewelry designer Tryna says, "It's a great time of year. We go to my parents' house where there are about 35 people. For me, it's about family and being together.

Tryna

"I've been married eight years and I have a two-year-old son. I would love the opportunity to have my own seder, in my own home. I haven't really gotten to that stage yet.

"I was having a conversation with my mum the other day I asked her, 'When will you let go, and let me and my sister start having Shabbat dinners and Passover seders? When will the transition happen from mother to daughter?'

Gail Singer

"Her response was she wouldn't let me because I don't have the time. And she said she's not ready for that yet, she enjoys it too much."

Gail Singer, an award-winning documentary director, and a former Manitoban, says, "Curiously enough, for the last couple of decades, Passover has been an occasion for getting together a diverse group who are a real rag-tag, interesting, collection of people. It's a mix of traditional, and the avant-garde.

"At my seders we pass the Haggadah around and everyone takes a turn reading out loud. We pass it around until somebody says, 'Can we eat now?' Well one particular year, the Haggadah kept going around and around the table, and I turned to the person next to me, and I said, 'This is quite unusual, what's going on?'

"She leaned over to me, and replied, 'Don't you realize what's happening here? You've got three theatre and film directors here and four actors – they're auditioning!' It was very funny. They really were auditioning, as it turned out.

"This year, for the first time in many years, my cousins on my mother's side are gathering everyone together for a seder in Vancouver. I haven't seen my cousins in over 2½ decades, and I am really looking forward to it."

David Gale

David Gale, another transplanted Winnipegger, is the hilarious host of Loving Spoonfuls on WTN.

"Until a couple of years ago, I prepared a waif's seder. I would invite my friends, Jewish and not, who didn't have a place to go for Passover, and I'd make a non-traditional seder. At my seders there's storytelling with games, puppets, exuberant songs and lots of humour. I usually do the first seder in Toronto with my 'adopted' family here and the second seder in Winnipeg with my real family.

"These days I spend it with my friends who have children. What is the essence of Passover…? It's to tell the children, so that when they are adults, they'll want to pass it on to their children. That's oral tradition. And that's very important to me."

Israel's first female rabbi wants to build bridges

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Kinneret Shiryon, the first woman rabbi in Israel, feels her work has been a success.

When she arrived in Israel 17 years ago, her criterion for success was to see an Israeli born and educated woman become ordained as a rabbi in Israel.

"It took 10 years, and since then there have been more, but after the first, I felt I had accomplished something."

Rabbi Kinneret Shiryon

Rabbi Shiryon, 44, who was born in New York and grew up in northern California, was educated at the Hebrew Union College Jewish Institute of Religion. She is spiritual leader of Kehillat Yozma, a Reform congregation, school and adult education institute in Modi'in.

She was here recently as part of a cross-country tour "to build bridges between the Canadian liberal community and our community in Modi'in."

She is also seeking financial support to build a permanent community centre on the one acre of land that was allocated to her congregation by the government in January. "It is the largest amount of land ever granted to a non-Orthodox community," she said.

The salaries of all Orthodox rabbis are paid for by the government, said Rabbi Shiryon. "Even though Israelis support [through taxes] the infrastructure of all religious services, we get all our money from fund-raising and from the membership. In reality, our members pay double – in their taxes and for the services they want from us."

Her congregation, she said, "is not just a congregation. We are seeking to build a community centre that will house our pre-school, cultural activities and of course, our synagogue and religious services. Right now, we function out of a pre-fabricated building."

The pre-school was started in 1997, she said, and since then, a kindergarten class has begun. "We are now working in partnership with the local municipality – which in itself is quite unusual – to open a Grade 1 class in September, and one grade a year after that. The school has an excellent reputation, and registration is full."

In the 17 years she has been in Israel, she said, "Progressive Judaism has become more accepted in the eyes of the secular Jewish community. Many are coming to a non-Orthodox congregation to express their spiritual identity.

"Things are changing. More and more people want us to officiate at weddings, funerals and bar and bat mitzvahs. We are getting more positive exposure than ever before."

Her work is a labour of love, she said. "I work 60 hours a week and receive two-thirds salary, but I am dedicated to seeing the congregation develop and grow. Although most Reform congregations in Israel have a North American membership, 90 percent of our membership is native born Israelis."

It is still unusual in Israel, however, to be a woman rabbi, she said. "In 1985 there was a huge media blitz about me, and people still recognize me from that. I'm still known as the woman rabbi. I am waiting for it to be more commonplace.

"Our big issue is having the Reform movement become recognized as an authentic expression of religious identity. We have made tremendous inroads in Israel, but our next step has to be having the electorate limit the enormous power of the [haredim]."

Israel can be a place of tolerance, she said. "It may be in my generation or the next generation, but it will happen."

Cotler quotes PM: Canada's position unchanged

Ultimately, Ritter feels the prime minister's message was essentially unchanged from Canada's long-standing and neutral policy on Mideast peace: that problems must be solved through direct negotiations between the parties.

Simply, "he didn't explain himself very well."

Canadian media excoriated the PM for several fumbles: snubbing Arabs in east Jerusalem (irking Palestinians); advising Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat that a unilateral declaration of independence could be a useful bargaining tool (irking Israel, and handing ammunition to Quebec separatists); stating Israel is "right" to want to keep the Sea of Galilee in talks with Syria (irking Syria); and dealing with reports that Canada had agreed to accept up to 15,000 Palestinian refugees (alarming his own staff) – all in less than four days.

Opposition politicians lambasted Chrétien, saying he had embarrassed Canada abroad and seriously undermined Canadian policy in the region. Others called for his immediate return to Canada. The media speculated Chrétien either deviated from briefing papers and decided to speak off the cuff, or that he simply doesn't understand the issues.

Amid all the noise, Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who also went along on the trip, drafted a hasty response regarding Chrétien's comments on a Palestinian unilateral declaration of independence. A copy of Cotler's statement was sent to The CJN.

In the statement, Cotler said he spoke with the prime minister, "who advised him that Canada's position – and that of the prime minister – is that the issue of Palestinian statehood should be settled through negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority."

The statement added that the Canadian position "does not support a Palestinian unilateral declaration of independence, or use of its threat as a pressure tactic." The statement quoted Chrétien as saying that "this matter of Palestinian statehood has to be resolved through negotiations. If the parties agree on an independent Palestinian state, we would welcome it, but it is for them to decide."

The statement also quoted the prime minister as saying there was "no comparison" to be made between a unilateral declaration of independence for Quebec and one for Palestinians.

The CIC's Ritter isn't worried over potential fallout.

"Canada went [to Israel and the Palestinian areas] with the idea of reinforcing our reputation as helpers not as interferers," he said. "At the end of the day, that's the impression that will be left.

"Some of [Chrétien's] comments could be interpreted as interference," Ritter allowed, "but we don't know that yet."

According to the CJC's Ronen, if anything, the prime minister's trip "has established more of a Canadian presence in the Middle East."

He sees no negative effects in the foreseeable future.

Neither did an official at Israel's embassy in Ottawa. Amir Maimon, chargé d'affaires at the embassy, said Chrétien's visit to Israel "reflects the good relationship between the two countries. As far as we're concerned, there's no change in the Canadian position regarding the Middle East peace process."

At least one Canadian expert on the Middle East agreed that Chrétien's comments were blown out of proportion. John Sigler, a retired political scientist, pointed out that neither U.S. President Bill Clinton nor British Prime Minister Tony Blair visited east Jerusalem on their trips to Israel.

The Canadian Jewish leaders who accompanied Chrétien noted that the trip received either positive coverage in the Israeli media, or was barely covered at all.

The play's her thing

Spotlight

Pat McCormack, manager of Leah Posluns Theatre, says that theatre has always been in her blood.

McCormack, who started singing on stage when she was four, and is a long-time volunteer with the Yorminstrels, a North York theatre group, says that this theatre work helped pave the way to her current position.

"The Yorminstrels was one of the first theatre groups to perform at Leah Posluns after it re-opened in 1995. I knew it was an amazing theatre, and the Yorminstrels needed space.

"Shortly afterwards, Leah Posluns was looking for a part-time manager. I took the job, and it eventually turned full time."

Pat McCormack

Her work with the community theatre group trained her for her work, says McCormack, who has a degree in mathematics, and spent 20 years in insurance sales and marketing. "I designed costumes, painted sets and did the lighting. I learned about the theatre inside out."

As manager, she arranges for the technical and cleaning staff, does the marketing and advertising and runs the Leah Posluns Theatre school, where she hires teachers and sets up the courses. "When I first came here four years ago, the future of the theatre was in question. It was my job to keep it open.

"It is really a gem. It is the only mid-size theatre in the north end of Toronto, the acoustics are great, and all the seats are good. With each group that performs here, I get two phone calls from people who want to bring in their own."

Though she tends to get a lot of Jewish groups because the audience is mainly Jewish, that is not a prerequisite, says McCormack. "We've been 80 to 85 percent booked for the past two years. The community has been very supportive, and I have also received tremendous moral and financial support from the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the Koffler Gallery. We all have the same goal – to keep the theatre up and running."

She encourages adults and children to try performing. "It is especially important for kids because eventually, they will all have to get up and speak. Acting helps them become comfortable speaking in front of people; they learn about body language and how to be calm."

The school is quite busy, she says. "It started small, but it now has four acting levels. We start with the basics, and we can work with students until they are ready for an audition."

McCormack has not given up her own life on stage. She still sings in about 20 performances a year, and did her first solo at the Leah Posluns Theatre. She also sits on the grant review committee for the Toronto Arts Council. "I love every aspect of theatre life," she says.

Birthright Israel works its 'magic'

By TAMARA KOCHBERG
Special to The CJN

It is hard to believe that it has been two months since I returned from my intense experience of leading Bus 5 through Israel with Birthright Israel Canada.

I was one of 48 Canadian madrichim (leaders) who had the great fortune to be a guide for some 40 participants.

The madrichim played an essential role as educators, helping participants make connections between Israel and their lives at home by exploring topics such as Israeli politics, environmental issues and the Holocaust.

Throughout the program, the concept of Jewish identity was addressed, viewed through many lenses, in the hope that participants would strengthen their own Jewish identities, both in Israel and in their home communities.

I am proud to report that the combination of being in Israel and the excellent program of Birthright Israel Canada worked its magic on most of the participants. Through the experience, many of the young people who were on my bus have rediscovered Judaism in some form and are eager to continue exploring their Jewish identities now that they have returned.

What is essential now is to ensure that these participants are made aware of the many opportunities they have in the community. This "post-programming" will prove to be an essential link in ensuring that the goals of the Birthright experience are realized.

In Toronto, Jewish Campus Services banked on reaching new students through the Birthright experience and prepared their March calendar accordingly.

Michelle Lackie, director of the Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto said that "outside of the shared 10-day experience in Israel, Birthright participants do not necessarily share common interests. As a result, JCS has chosen to plug these students into our diverse and full March calendar."

Last month's programs included Colouring Ourselves: An Arts Festival of Jewish Creativity; Israel Week at U of T; and A Jewish Response to Violence Against Women, hosted by York University's Jewish Students' Federation.

Birthright participants' attendance at Jewish Campus Service of Greater Toronto's (JCS) March events was very good. For instance, at the Shabbat Across Canada program on March 31, 20 of the 70 who attended the program were Birthright participants from various buses.

In addition, some of these young people are already assuming leadership roles in JCS projects, and others are expressing their interest in doing so once they finish their exams.

On my bus, the Yad Vashem visit moved many to the point where they are now interested in becoming involved in Holocaust education at home.

Three Birthright participants will be part of a Yom Hashoah memorial service planned for May [illegible] those who were on the bus with [illegible] at the program and Birthright participants are already signed up for the JCS Washington Holocaust Museum trip in May.

Bus-specific retreats are also being explored for May. Ideally, each bus will get together for a Shabbat to share another Jewish experience and build upon their existing connections to Judaism and to the Toronto Jewish community.

The Ontario campus organizations are putting together a Birthright student leadership conference for December called 2001: A Winter Odyssey, A Celebration of Jewish Student Life.

Much has already been accomplished in following up on the experiences gained in Israel over a very powerful 10 days. Post-programming is a challenge at times since funding for specific Birthright follow-up programs is extremely limited, if it is available at all. However, JCS and other groups are incorporating post-Birthright activities into their core programs as much as possible.

Tamara Kochberg is the Koach program co-ordinator for Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

Social historian on lookout for new challenges

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – University of Toronto social historian Natalie Zemon Davis is a true-blue pioneer.

She was one of the first academics to teach a course on the history of women. And she brought the concept of the interdisciplinary course to the classroom.

A specialist in 16th-century France who has taught at Brown, York, Princeton, Yale, University of California and École des Hautes Études en Sciences Sociales, Davis has never flinched from new challenges.

At U of T, where she is presently an adjunct professor of history, a senior fellow at the Centre for Comparative Literature and a professor of medieval studies, Davis helped launch a course on the history of women back in 1971. Realizing that she was a trendsetter, she said, "There are many such courses all over North America today."

Davis, 71, was channelled into the field by Jill Ker Conway, who wrote a doctoral thesis on early women PhDs in the United States. Through discussions with Conway, Davis knew that she had stumbled on an unusually rich topic.

Natalie Zemon Davis

Not surprisingly, the idea met with a frosty reception. "There were historians who doubted that one could find sources for such research and teaching," she said. "So I immediately went to work to find them."

The first course she and Conway devised was called Society and the Sexes in Early Modern Europe and the United States. Students were required to read the memoirs of Glikl bas Judah Leib, a remarkable 17th-century Jewish woman from Hamburg whom adversity had transformed into an accomplished trader in money and precious stones.

Glikl, who penned her autobiography in Yiddish, became a pivotal character in Davis' book, Women on the Margins: Three Seventeenth Century Lives, published in 1995. In addition to Glikl, Davis profiled Marie De L'Incarnation, a Catholic nun who founded the first Ursuline convent and school in North America, and Maria Sibylla Merian, a naturalist who exerted a profound influence on botany and entomology.

Davis' bent for the interdisciplinary method can best be seen in her courses on anthropology and history, literature and history, and film and history.

"History can't be understood without seeing people from many points of view: economic, religious, political, cultural and social," she explained.

"An interdisciplinary approach allows that breadth. With Glikl, for instance, I looked at her life in terms of the social and economic history of the Jews and of Jewish women in Germany and France in the 17th century, but I also used techniques of literary analysis to interpret her autobiography and, thereby, her mentality. Interdisciplinary approaches are becoming more common, but are still followed by only a minority of scholars."

Davis, indeed, used this methodology in her recently published book, Slaves on Screen: Film and Historical Vision (Random House).

In this intriguing volume, she challenges historians to take seriously the power of film to portray the past. Arguing that film can add to our understanding of history, she examines five movies about the resistance to slavery in different times and places: Stanley Kubrick's Spartacus, Gillo Pontecorvo's Burn!, Tomas Gutierrez Alea's The Last Supper, Steven Spielberg's Amistad and Jonathan Demme's Beloved.

"A good historical film can not only show events in a lively fashion, but can show how big movements, tendencies and trends play out and are experienced by individuals."

Educated at Smith College, Radcliffe College and the University of Michigan, Davis is no newcomer to film. "At Smith College, I became interested in new forms of communication, and film seemed immensely exciting. But once I started graduate school, I got absorbed in the process of research that led to writing and teaching."

Since then, Davis, the recipient of several honorary degrees, has churned out a series of books, notably Society and Culture in Early Modern France and Fiction in the Archives: Pardon Tales and Their Tellers in Sixteenth Century France (an analysis of the stories people told kings so that they would be pardoned for capital crimes).

She has also written The Return of Martin Guerre, an exploration of identity in a peasant milieu. Davis produced the book after being a historical consultant on a movie set.

As The Return of Martin Guerre – starring Gerard Depardieu – was being filmed, Davis continued her research on the protagonist, a French peasant who is considered one of history's most famous impostors.

"Watching the actors and director work gave me new ideas for my thinking about the past," noted Davis (whose Women on the Margins may be turned into a docudrama by two Montreal filmmakers).

Davis, whose husband Chandler is a U of T mathematician, has just finished The Gift in Sixteenth Century France, which examines the practice of gift exchanges in various classes of society and views gifts as a source of both harmony and conflict.

Davis is currently working on Braided Histories, a study of cultural diversity in the lives of remarkable persons in the 16th, 18th and 20th centuries.

Web site helps students find exams

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No more wasting precious time waiting in line for old exams. No more squandering money photocopying your last beacon of hope before the fatal exam period begins.

Mike Wasserman, a former York University student and Ryan Jacobs a University of Toronto graduate, have invented a tool they claim will end your exam time woes.

Their new invention, launched on March 20, is called Examsource.com – a search engine designed to find university exams.

"I hated lining up in libraries and photocopying old exams. I decided there had to be a better way," Wasserman said. According to Wasserman, Examsource.com has had more than 150,000 hits.

PM's 'gaffe' no gaffe at all

So our prime minister took the plunge and headed off into that black hole of politics called the Middle East. No sooner did he swear off of any "off-the-cuff" remarks than he offered his support for the negotiating strategy of Yasser Arafat concerning the Palestinians' threat to unilaterally declare independence (UDI). Reports from Israel suggest that the comment was dismissed as an ill-timed stumble. Of course, back home it resonated in the House of Commons and in Quebec's National Assembly.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

The prime minister must have been aware of the seductive urge to link a Palestinian UDI with one by a PQ government. When the government presented its case to the Supreme Court a couple of years back, a whole section of the Justice Department's legal brief addressed the differences between Canadian support for Palestinian self-determination and for Quebec self-determination. The brief discussed why a Quebec UDI was not parallel to the Palestinian model. In the end, that line of reasoning was not pursued in court.

Some people in Ottawa (your loyal scribe included) believe that Jean Chrétien's message in Gaza regarding UDI was very precise and deliberate.

It is important to recall that there were two components to his Middle East comments. The first related to the strategic value of waving the UDI card. The second, which the prime minister emphasized more than the Canadian media reporting on the trip, was that despite its value as a negotiating tactic, UDI could never replace direct negotiations between the Israelis and Palestinians as the vehicle towards satisfying some of the Palestinian aspirations.

All foreign policy is a function of domestic politics. That is an immutable law of governance in Canada, and the prime minister has proved it again. This message was directed at Quebec premier, Lucien Bouchard and translates roughly as follows: Quebec can threaten to go its own way with the substance, timing and rules governing a future referendum. However, the only way it will ever be able to satisfy some of the legitimate aspirations of Quebec nationalists is through direct negotiations.

It was probably not an unwelcome message for Bouchard, who has just returned from a less than successful foreign excursion of his own. And it was certainly a clever way for the PM to signal his desire to move towards a constructive resolution of Quebec grievances.

Peres to headline tribute dinner

MONTREAL — Nobel laureate and former Israeli prime minister, Shimon Peres, will be the guest speaker at a tribute dinner honouring Quebec pharmacy magnate Jean Coutu and his wife Marcelle.

The event, held by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, will celebrate the establishment of the Jean and Marcelle Coutu Centre for the Improvement of Agriculture in Developing Countries.

The Coutus will be presented with the Friends' Scopus Award, the highest honour bestowed by the organization. It will put them in the same company as past recipients, including former U.S. president Gerald Ford, Steven Spielberg, Conrad Black and, in Montreal, business executives Paul Desmarais and Jacques Ménard.

Jean Coutu is chair of the board and chief executive officer of the Jean Coutu Group Inc., which operates over 500 pharmacies in Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and in the New England states.

According to a Léger & Léger poll published in the March issue of Commerce magazine, the company is the most admired by Quebecers, the third year in a row it has achieved top rating. There are about 225 Jean Coutu outlets in the province.

Through their Fondation Marcelle and Jean Coutu, the couple is actively involved in many humanitarian causes, particularly in the Third World.

Outremont council votes to retain opening prayer

By JANICE ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Outremont council has voted 8-1 to retain the prayer that opens its meetings, even though the Quebec Human Rights Commission (QHRC) has directed the city to cease the practice

The QHRC ruled that the prayer is in violation of constitutional guarantees of equality and freedom of religion and conscience.

The one Jewish member on the council, Sydney Pfeiffer, who is Orthodox, was among those in favour of keeping the prayer.

"This is an innocuous prayer. It is inoffensive to me as an Orthodox Jew; it has no Christian overtones. And, as an Orthodox Jew, I can't see myself voting against a prayer," he said.

Pfeiffer noted that, while serving as pro-mayor, he had recited the prayer himself. But first he checked its text with then Chief Rabbi Pinchas Hirschprung. (Normally, the prayer is recited by the mayor or his replacement only.)

Pfeiffer maintains that Outremont's non-sectarian prayer should not be compared to the situation in Ontario, where the Lord's Prayer is recited before meetings in some towns. The Ontario Court of Appeal ruled last September that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms forbids the use of Christian prayers at municipal meetings.

"We do not believe in separation of church and state in Canada," Pfeiffer said. "The constitution refers to God. This is not a church-state issue; it's a nice, old tradition.

"If we believe in the separation of church and state, we would have to make sure that no court or council chamber has a crucifix or a Christmas tree, and that would be pushing things to an absurd degree." (Unlike at Montreal City Hall, there is no crucifix in the Outremont council chamber.)

The only Outremont councillor who voted for the abolition of the prayer was Stéphane Harbour.

The prayer reads: "O God, eternal and all mighty, who possesses all wisdom, we are here assembled in Your presence to adopt measures intended to assure the good administration of the City of Outremont and the well-being of its population. Grant us to wish what conforms to Your will, to search with prudence and to know it with certainty."

Outremont Mayor Jérôme Unterberg did not vote on the prayer issue, but said he is comfortable with the decision.

"Not one Outremont resident has raised this issue with the council in the 12 years that I have sat on it," he said. "At least 90 percent of the citizens who have spoken to us have expressed an opinion in favour of keeping the prayer."

Unterberg said he can understand the legal argument against prayer in public administrations, "but morally I don't see any harm in keeping the prayer."

Outremont resident Daniel Baril, a member of the Mouvement Laïque québécois, made the complaint against the prayer to the QHRC in 1993.

Similar complaints were also received by the QHRC about the prayers used to open meetings in the small town of Saint-André-Avellin near Montebello, and the Montreal Urban Community (MUC). The former agreed to abide by the QHRC ruling.

In February, the MUC council, which is composed of the Montreal city council and the mayors of the 28 municipalities on Montreal island, voted 2-1 for keeping its prayer. Unterberg was among the minority that voted against continuing that prayer.

There was a difference of opinion among the six Jews on the council as to whether that prayer was Christian-inspired, but the only Orthodox Jew, Saulie Zajdel, was firm that he did not find it sectarian.

Adath Israel Outremont alumni plan Sept. reunion

MONTREAL — Alumni of the Adath Israel Schools of Outremont are preparing to hold a massive reunion to mark the 60th anniversary of the founding of the institution that provided the foundation for their Hebrew education.

The reunion will be held Sept. 16 to 18.

An estimated 800 men and women graduated from the elementary and high schools during the schools' time in Outremont. Many have gone on to fame and fortune, not only in Montreal, but in major centres in North America and abroad.

The reunion committee is hoping to locate and attract as many graduates as possible to the September weekend, during which the former students will be involved with the Sabbath morning services at the current Adath Israel Congregation and have a special dinner at the synagogue.

On March 31, 1940, dedication ceremonies were held to officially open the Adath Israel Congregation of Outremont, which gave birth to the first congregation-sponsored Hebrew day school in Canada, with an initial registration of 177 pupils, who used classrooms within the synagogue.

Spearheaded by Rabbi Charles Bender, founding president Joel Sternthal and educational director Mordecai Mendelsohn, the school's objective was to create an institution devoted to the spiritual welfare of the young Jewish people in the Montreal suburb that was growing by leaps and bounds.

By 1943, the existing facilities were deemed inadequate, and a self-contained school building was to be built adjacent to the synagogue. Because of the war effort, construction was delayed, but the building opened for the school term in September 1947.

Demand for the Adath Israel system of education grew, and by 1950, the sod had been turned for a high school building, which was officially opened two years later.

Other Montreal notables who were involved in the Adath Israel Schools' growth and expansion included Gordon Brown, Isaac Gold, Sam Silver, Sam Shiff and Sol Fine.

The Adath Israel Schools remained independent until 1966, when dwindling enrolment and difficult financial circumstances led to a merger with the Young Israel congregational school, which was facing similar problems.

That merger resulted in creation of the Hebrew Academy, which continues to offer a full Hebrew day school education in Montreal today.

Reunion chair Thelma Cohen (1956) and committee member Morty Wellen (1952) have launched a mail campaign to all graduates at their last known address.

"As you can imagine, the task of locating every graduate is challenging, to say the least," said Wellen, who is using his architectural office as a focal point for contact with graduates.

"The success of this event will depend upon the attendance and assistance of those we have been able to contact," Cohen said.

Several hundred responses have been gathered in the first few weeks, but the most difficult job is to reach those whose families are no longer in Montreal.

"We know of graduates in just about every major North American community, as well as overseas, including Israel. It is through the help of the Anglo-Jewish press as well as various congregations to whom we are addressing ourselves that we hope to reach everyone," he said.

Graduates of Adath Israel Schools of Outremont are asked to contact Morty Wellen at 4846 Sherbrooke Street West, #102, Montreal, Que., H3Z 1G8, by e-mail at mfwellen@qc.aibn.com or by telephone at 514-485-3003; or Thelma Cohen by telephone or fax at 514-336-5457.

AWARDS BREAKFAST: At a recent breakfast at the Bloor JCC, Harvey Kotler (seen in inset above), past president of the Bloor JCC, was honoured for outstanding service. Also honoured was Tom Mihalik (right), pictured with Coleman Bernstein, head of the chapel committee. Mihalik, the owner of Tom's Place, was recognized for his contribution of more than $150,000 to the centre since 1997, through Tom's Place spring and fall warehouse sales.

Montreal panel discusses response to Haider

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two Jewish community members say they met privately with controversial Austrian politician Joerg Haider out of political necessity.

This meeting took place in February when Haider was in Montreal.

Lawyers Brahm Campbell and Aaron Pollack revealed for the first time why and how they met with Haider in a panel discussion with Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) honorary vice-president Frank Schlesinger and B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) national vice-president Stephen Scheinberg.

Campbell and Pollack met with Haider despite Congress' and BBC's call for the community to ostracize him.

Campbell and Pollack defended their action as one of necessity if Jews are to face the reality of the far-right in European politics.

Schlesinger and Scheinberg maintained that it was right to shun Haider because the purpose of his wanting to make contact with the Jewish community was to gain credibility from the publicity such meetings might have received.

Campbell also unsuccessfully tried to arrange "at the behest of a Holocaust victim" a tour of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre for Haider.

Pollack, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee in the early 1970s, said, at Campbell's invitation, he received Haider in his office.

Haider was accompanied by Peter Sichrovsky, an Austrian-Jewish journalist who represents Haider's Freedom Party in the European Parliament, and Campbell's client, Avi Gasit-Muehlstein of St. Sauveur. Gasit-Muehlstein was identified as the Tash Chassidic community's "political consultant" in a letter to Haider before his Montreal visit, correspondence which was later disavowed by a Tash official.

Pollack said he agreed to meet Haider because he does not trust what he reads in newspapers and wanted to know more about him.

He said he was not impressed by Haider, and referred to him as a "peashooter."

With his trendy clothing and hairstyle, Pollack said Haider has the image of a "young politician who knows his market and how to tap into young people...It would be far-fetched to think he could be the next chancellor of Austria."

When asked about past statements that seem sympathetic to the Nazis, Pollack said Haider acknowledged that he had made a mistake. "But this is the standard response today of any astute politician."

He said he learned that Haider visited Israel in 1983 and regarded it as "an independent, sovereign state with full legitimacy. This is probably a better response than you would have gotten from Bruno Kreisky," Austria's former Socialist chancellor and foreign minister, whom Pollack described as anti-Israel and anti-Semitic.

Both Pollack and Campbell said that it was in Jewish tradition and interest to talk with enemies, if they are "reasonable," and perhaps convert them into friends.

Pollack noted that Jesse Jackson was once "anathema" to Jews, but is received as "an honoured guest" today."That's because there was a change in attitudes by both Jackson and the Jewish community."

Campbell went further. "To turn our backs and pretend [Haider] does not exist is sheer stupidity." He said he consulted a rabbi before acting as Haider's intermediary and was told the Mishnah requires that Jews dialogue with and gain knowledge about their enemies.

Campbell and Pollack noted that, despite 55 years of Socialist governments, which are supposedly more friendly to Jews, Austria "never faced its past" and has not compensated Jews who were slave labourers or who lost property during the Holocaust.

Schlesinger, however, insisted that "if we do not share basic democratic values then there is no basis for dialogue."

In Haider's case, he said, "we should not be giving him the boost or the photo-ops he needs. He should be isolated like a virus and kept away."

Scheinberg argued that it was important for Jews and the world to send a strong message to Europe that legitimizing extremist parties is unacceptable. The inclusion of the Freedom Party in the ruling coalition breaks "a taboo that had held since World War II" and could be repeated in other countries where centre-right parties are seeking alliances, he said.

There can be little doubt about what the Freedom Party stands for, when its Web site has links to the Ku Klux Klan and neo-Nazi sites, Scheinberg said.

Both he and Schlesinger doubted Haider's sincerity in wanting to learn more about the Holocaust, observing that he has already been to the U.S. Holocaust Museum and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

However, they agreed that if he had shown up unannounced at the Holocaust Centre he should have been accepted like any other public member.

"The only reason he came to Montreal was to gain credibility. I think the cold shoulder he received probably led him to shortly resign the party leadership and take a lower profile," Schlesinger said.

He warned that the Jewish community "should not allow itself to be divided by those who approach from the left field" rather than deal with the community's elected leaders, like those representatives in CJC and BBC.

The panel discussion was sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University and Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem.

Israeli youth village might serve as model for B.C.

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israel's Hadassim Children and Youth Village may be used as a model for helping Asian immigrant children in British Columbia adapt to life in Canada.

Hadassim, a residential refuge for newly arrived teens and wayward youth, was founded by Hadassah-WIZO of Canada 53 years ago.

Zvi Levy, director of Hadassim since 1976, recently spent a week in Victoria consulting with James Anglin, head of the child welfare department at the University of British Columbia's School of Social Work.

Anglin will bring his report to officials from the provincial government, who will examine to what extent Hadassim can be used as a model for helping young Asian immigrants in Vancouver.

Levy, who was in Montreal prior to departing for British Columbia, said many of the Asian children in that province – they number in the hundreds – find themselves in a situation similar to that of immigrant children in Israel. Many of them are refugees without language skills, often arriving in their new country without their parents.

"Israeli society and the state had the same problem of uprooted, parentless families," Levy said.

"What we have been able to do [through Hadassim] is act as a shock absorber. It's hard enough to be an immigrant, and if you superimpose that over adolescence, it is even harder.

"The idea," he said, "is not to to eliminate distinct cultures, but to develop lots and lots of special ways of using teaching skills and knowledge in a cultural context, of making goal-oriented education a turning point in one's life."

Levy, who also spoke to Hadassah's national executive in Montreal, said his intent in British Columbia is to transmit the essential philosophical, organizational and theoretical principles behind the Hadassim village, which has achieved an enviable success rate since its founding in 1947.

More than 250,000 adolescents – ranging from children of Holocaust survivors to more recent immigrant teens, as well as abused and neglected youths and drug abusers – have passed through the Hadassim system and become educated and productive Israelis.

Well over 90 percent of youth village alumni, Levy said, go on to become educated, full members of Israeli society, with careers and families.

Hadassim's success rate seems to lie in fostering an atmosphere of trust, security, and community, he said.

The village provides education and strong emotional support in a warm, nurturing, tolerant and relaxed community environment that builds feelings of self-worth within the individual, he explained.

Some 400 of Hadassim's 1,700 students reside on campus. About half of the residents are immigrants – predominantly from Ethiopia or Russia – who have experienced family crises, or who feel alienated and rejected, both within their families and in their new land.

Hadassim founded by Hadassah 53 years ago

The village has 11 residential buildings and a fully equipped, 60-classroom school that offers art, computer classes, and recreational facilities. The 60 families who work in the village also live there, contributing to the "family" environment, Levy said.

He noted that while clinicians such as psychologists are involved, they do not actually do their work on the campus.

"We knew that to rehabilitate the human spirit, you don't render services," he said. Instead, basic to the village's ethos is to be "goal-oriented" and to "wait actively" for village residents and students to develop at their own pace.

People are rarely expelled from the Hadassim Youth Village; but even when this occurs, the youth often goes on to get a university degree, a sure sign that the village has had a positive effect, Levy said.

An optimist by nature, he said the only type of student that scares him, "is the one who gives up."

Those who do are not necessarily the ones who are experimenting with drugs or committing petty crimes, he said, but rather they tend to be "suffering from total despair and alienation.

"If you had to sum it [the work of Hadassim] up in one sentence," Levy said, "it is that we try to show our students that they are not victims of fate, but masters of it [and give them] a sense that they belong in the world."

Young Anglos said facing job discrimination

Housefather seeks presidency of Alliance Quebec

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Anthony Housefather's first priority, if elected president of Alliance Quebec (AQ) next month, will be to try to persuade the Quebec government to hold a parliamentary commission on how to keep young anglophones in the province.

In particular, Housefather wants the commission to address the need for employment equity.

Housefather, 30, thinks young anglophones, even though they are bilingual, are the victims of "systemic discrimination" in employment, especially in the public sector.

Anglophones represent less than 0.7 percent of Quebec's civil service, even though they are 15 percent of the province's population, he said.

The federal civil service in Quebec is not much better. "In the federal Justice Department in Quebec, there are just 10 English-speakers among 300 employees, and they are below four percent elsewhere," Housefather said.

At the municipal level, anglophones are also under-represented, he said. "On the West Island, where 75 percent of the population is English-speaking, less than 20 percent of the municipal employees are English," he said.

Anglophones' career opportunities are also suffering in the private sector, he said. "C.V.s are often accepted only if they are in French. Interviews are often conducted only in French. Often the French skills required are more than actually needed for the job."

If he becomes president, Housefather will be leading one of AQ's biggest court battles: challenging the language of work rules in Bill 101.

Housefather was the first to announce his candidacy for the AQ presidency. He hopes to succeed William Johnson, under whom he has served as vice-president for the past two years. The election is scheduled for May 26.

A lawyer by profession, Housefather has been manager of the legal department of Eicon Technology since 1997, and is a part-time MBA student at Concordia University. He has been a Hampstead city councillor since 1994, and a board and executive member of AQ for five years.

He is an executive member of ProMontreal, FEDERATION CJA's program to encourage young Jews to stay in Quebec. Its focus is to help them find careers here.

He's also a member of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec regional executive.

Last fall, he sought the federal Liberal nomination in Mount Royal, but bowed out when Irwin Cotler entered the race.

Housefather received the endorsement of Johnson, who said Housefather's qualities of "tact and diplomacy," as well as his youth, are what the English-rights advocacy organization needs at this time.

As he ends his two-year presidency, Johnson described Quebec anglophones as "confused, fragmented, weakened and divided," and in need of a leader with "the healing talents" of Housefather.

Above all, Johnson said AQ needs to appeal more to the young. "Its most significant failure" has been its inability to convey to this age group the importance of defending human rights.

Housefather said a strong bond was formed between the two when, in 1998, they shared the experience of being splattered by a cream pie in the St. Jean Baptiste parade.

If elected, Housefather said he will march in this year's parade, if the Quebec government again portrays the event as being for all Quebecers and issues an invitation for everyone to take part.

Housefather said he is convinced that "the zealots who have taken over the parade, the ones who shouted and vilified us" are not representative of the separatist movement as a whole.

While he stated that he will remain faithful to the principles Johnson espoused and hopes he will stay on the board, Housefather stressed that he is a moderate and seeks to have AQ perceived in that light.

Quebec anglophones today are diverse, Housefather said, but they share beliefs in "a united Canada, living as free and equal citizens, and seeing our language become one of the common languages in the province, seen and used in public."

Housefather said he is not concerned about having supported the "staying Canadian" resolutions after the 1995 referendum. Those resolutions, which varied in their specificity among 45 municipalities, generally expressed the will of these towns to remain part of Canada in the event of separation.

"If Quebec can separate with a 50 to 60 percent majority, then people of Hampstead, who voted 99 percent against, and others should have the same right to stay part of Canada," he said.

Housefather said he intends to be "a forceful advocate for the presence of Canada in Quebec" to counteract the "brainwashing the separatist government" has carried out among Quebecers to turn them against the country.

He also vowed "to take to the streets, if necessary," if Quebec passes legislation forcing municipal mergers.

Mergers in the Montreal area would result in many towns losing their bilingual status, because anglophones would no longer make up at least half of their populations.

A Passover Surprise

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

My father was an atheist. Mama was not. Although he had grown up in an Orthodox Jewish household in Czarist Russia during the 1890s and early 1900s, Daddy became involved with the socialists and wanted no part of religion.

He was a caring son and brother, and later when he came to this country and married my mother, he was a devoted husband and very loving father. He was a good man, an honest man and a fine tailor who was respected by just about everyone who knew him. But he was as firmly a non-believer as his father, my zayde, was a devout believer.

I know that he didn't want to hurt his family and he did whatever he could in every other way, but he would not and could not believe. Nor would he pretend. He would not be a hypocrite and go to shul, and he would not conduct a seder in our home at Pesach. This was a grievous bone of contention between him and my mother.

He would attend a seder at his parents' home, and after they died, at his sister's or brother's, but he didn't really participate and there was no way he would lead his own seder.

One night, his refusal sparked a strange response from Mama. It was the night of the first seder; she had prepared a traditional Pesach dinner and set wine and candles on the table, hoping that this time, Daddy would agree to read from the Haggadah. But he would not.

Suddenly, Mama slammed the plate of matzah down on the tablecloth, grabbed me by the hand, and said, "Put on your coat. We're going out!"

She seized her own coat and hat, opened the front door, and as we stepped onto the porch, slammed that door much harder than she had slammed down the matzah. Almost running up Wanless Avenue, just north of Lawrence, she headed for the Yonge streetcar with me in tow.

"Where are we going?" I finally gasped after we boarded the car.

"You'll see," she said through clenched teeth.

We rode down to Dundas Street, transferred to a westbound car and got off at Spadina. Then we walked the short distance to Baldwin Street, turned in and paused briefly in front of the red brick house where my great-aunt and uncle Liebe and Yarmiah Grafstein lived. Uncle Yarmiah was a shochet, an Orthodox man.

Mama knocked at the door, and not waiting for anyone to answer, simply stepped in.

Uncle Yarmiah's family was already seated around the table, no doubt having just returned from shul, and their attitude as we appeared, would have made a very interesting painting.

Our uncle's mouth dropped open and he started to ask, in Yiddish, why we were there but Auntie Liebe, who was particularly insightful, nudged him with her elbow and said, "Shah."

She quickly made room at the already crowded table and the seder proceeded as if we had been expected.

The dinner was bountiful, the seder was probably the longest I had ever experienced and Uncle Yarmiah and Auntie Liebe's sons, who had very sweet voices, rejoiced in song.

About midnight we thanked everyone and went out to Spadina Avenue where we were able to hail a taxi, out of sight of our shomer Shabbat relatives, who probably had no illusions about how we would get home.

Every light was on in our house when we returned and Daddy was sitting with the newspaper in front of him, just as if he had been reading peacefully all night.

No one ever mentioned that evening again, but years later, when I was married and my husband Joe and I had children of our own, Joe regularly led the seders, warm and meaningful, and my parents attended. At the first seder in our house, Joe asked each person in turn to read a section from the Haggadah. Some read in English, others in Hebrew. When he came to my father he asked casually, if he would read a passage.

My father did, entirely in Hebrew. Until that moment, I had not realized that he knew the language. But of course he did.

Arabs put regional talks on hold

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An Arab League decision last month opposing the normalization of relations with Israel has put multilateral talks for regional co-operation on hold.

The resumption of the talks was to have been an important political achievement for the Barak government.

Committees involved in the multilateral framework were slated to resume work soon after years of inactivity. But Oman cancelled a meeting slated for this week involving a regional group working on water issues. And according to a high-ranking Israeli political official, committees on economic co-operation, environmental affairs and refugees that had scheduled to resume activities over the next two months are now doubting whether those activities will take place.

Oman has yet to reschedule a new date for the water discussions. Canada, which was supposed to host discussions about refugee issues, has informed Israel that it will be unable to do so on account of Arab opposition, the political official said.

The same source added that Jordan and Tunisia, designated hosts of the economics and environmental affairs talks, have also signalled that those discussions will be postponed.

Israeli officials believe that Oman has deferred the water talks due to pressures it faces in its capacity as acting leader of the Arab League.

The officials retain hope that the meetings of the other committees will take place as scheduled. Israel has turned to the United States, Russia and Japan for help in arranging the resumption of the multilateral talks, but those countries have indicated that it will be difficult to counter pan-Arab opposition.

For Israel, the anticipated resumption of multilateral talks this year ranked as an important diplomatic gain. Israel views the talks as a sign of its enhanced status and integration in the region in the wake of the ongoing peace process.

Egypt has spearheaded opposition to normalization with Israel, and has in recent years worked to derail the multilateral framework. The talks' arms control committee has been held in abeyance since the days of the Rabin government, owing to differences between Cairo and Jerusalem on nuclear issues. The activities of the other regional committees were suspended during the Netanyahu government's time in office.

Syria expected to buy $500 M in Russian arms

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Russia and Syria are expected to conclude a $500-million arms deal that includes advanced fighters and a sophisticated air defence missile system, according to recent reports in the Russian newspaper Vremya.

The deal is expected to take effect as early as this week and includes 30 Sukhoi-27 air-superiority fighters, and possibly the very advanced long-range S-300 air defence missile system. In addition, Syria is expected to receive another shipment of Kornet and Metis advanced anti-tank guided missiles.

Over the past two years, the Syrian army has managed to upgrade its anti-tank capabilities by acquiring various types of Russian-made missiles for use against armour. Some of these weapons are guided by laser to their targets, and have considerably improved the Syrians' night-fighting capacities. Until recently, Syria acknowledged Israel's distinct advantage in this field.

Gen. Leonid Ivashov, the head of the department for international co-operation at the Russian Defence Ministry, visited Damascus two months ago and met with Mustafa Tlass, the Syrian defence minister, and Ali Aslan, the chief of staff. The officials discussed possibilities for military co-operation and developments in the Middle East peace process.

During the visit, Russian news agencies reported that Russian military industry sources said Syria intended to modernize its armed forces. Syria would be capable of paying hundreds of millions of dollars for that purpose, the reports indicated.

In recent years, there have been several reports of major arms deals between Russia and Syria that failed to materialize. Apparently, the greatest obstacle in these deals is Moscow's insistence that Syria repay its huge debts of nearly $12 billion accrued over past arms transfers from the former Soviet Union.

Bashar: Process not over

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Bashar Assad, who by most accounts is in line to inherit his father's presidency in Syria, said that "the peace process is not over and the door remains open."

In an interview over the weekend in the London-based al Wassat, Assad said "The pessimism that followed the Geneva summit was much greater than the reality.

"It's possible that some of the pessimism was a result of people believing that the summit was going to finalize the peace process, and there were those who called it a last chance. But that isn't accurate, since the last opportunity will be the meeting at which peace is achieved."

Emphasizing that Syria made a strategic decision for peace "a long time ago," Bashar Assad says in the interview that "the issue of land is a matter of sovereignty and honour. Economic or real estate issues are not relevant when the subject is the homeland. The matter of the land is not open to opinions and interpretations. Syria is not considering granting presents of that kind. That's the position of the leadership and of every Syrian citizen."

According to Assad, "President Clinton understands how important this is for us."

Iranian Jews' spy trial adjourned till May

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

SHIRAZ, Iran – The trial of the 13 Iranian Jews charged with spying for Israel and the United States began last Thursday morning in Shiraz behind closed doors.

At the end of the opening session, the trial was adjourned until May 1, at the request of the defendants' attorneys, who did not see the indictments until two days before the trial opened.

Judge Sadeq Nourani agreed to consider releasing the suspects on bail for the Passover holiday.

The head of the local judiciary, Hasan Ali Amiri, said four of the defendants admitted to the charges and asked the court for mercy.

But the defence team denied that any of the defendants had admitted guilt and said that private confessions were not legally valid.

If convicted, the defendants could face the death penalty.

Only four of the 13 defendants were present at the opening of the trial, and several others waited outside the courtroom.

Relatives of some of the Jews accused of espionage were brought before a press conference last week in Shiraz organized by the chief of the judiciary of the province of Fars. The trial began on April 13 and was adjourned until May 1. Observers, including the press, were barred from the courtroom. [RNS/Reuters photo]

"Not all 13 defendants showed up because that is what the judge requested. But they are all supposed to be here on May 1," said Esmail Nasari, a member of the defence team.

The defence team indicated that there was some basis for a case against their clients, but said it remained to be seen whether the serious charge of espionage was justified.

"Is what is in the dossier enough to convict them of espionage? We believe not," said lawyer Karim Sadeqi.

Journalists who attended the courthouse were not allowed into the room where the hearings were taking place. According to reports from Shiraz, western diplomats and human rights' activists were also present at the courthouse, as were relatives of the defendants. The families were not allowed to meet with the defendants.

The eight Muslims arrested with the Jews will be tried separately.

Meanwhile last Thursday, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef asked Egypt to intercede with Iran on behalf of the Jews charged with spying.

Israeli National Infrastructure Minister Eli Suissa (Shas), travelled to Cairo and told reporters he had delivered a handwritten letter to President Hosni Mubarak from Shas's spiritual leader asking Mubarak to help.

"The president said that he will do all he can to help," Suissa said.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa said later there was little Egypt could do.

"We have no idea about this subject," he told reporters.

Judge confirms Irving a Holocaust denier

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — For much of the past five years, Deborah Lipstadt, an American Holocaust scholar, and David Irving, a British Holocaust denier, have been locked in a grotesque legal embrace.

That close encounter finally ended last week, exactly three months after the start of a libel trial in which Irving accused Lipstadt and her publisher of ruining his career by labelling him a Holocaust denier.

Addressing a High Court in London, Justice Charles Gray ruled that Lipstadt had proved the central charges she had levelled against Irving in her 1994 book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory. The judge also exonerated her publisher, Penguin Books.

The verdict against Irving was significant because of his former status as a serious historian, said Omer Bartov, a history professor at Rutgers University.

Irving was highly regarded for his treasure trove of documents on Hitler and other Nazi officials, he said. Bartov added that it was important to expose people like Irving, "who has been published by respectable publishers and been cited by scholars like me. But in recent years, he'd become more extreme, and associated himself with neo-Nazi circles."

Michael Berenbaum, Distinguished Professor of Holocaust Studies at Clark University, also said it is important for the court to help set professional standards for historians.

"Instead of going down into the gutter with Irving, we elevated the question into what is the obligation of a historian to interpret evidence and translate material. And Irving was found wanting," said Berenbaum.

Gray did not mince words when he declared that Irving was indeed, as Lipstadt had charged, "an active Holocaust denier."

The judge also called Irving "anti-Semitic and racist," saying he has "portrayed Hitler in an unwarrantedly favourable light."

Referring to Irving's political activities, the judge said, "the content of his speeches and interviews often display a distinctly pro-Nazi and anti-Jewish bias.

"He makes surprising and often unfounded assertions about the Nazi regime which tend to exonerate the Nazis for the appalling atrocities they inflicted on the Jews," the judge said.

Gray found that, "for the most part, the falsification of the historical record was deliberate.

"Irving was motivated by a desire to present events in a manner consistent with his own ideological beliefs, even if that involved distortion and manipulation of historical evidence."

He ruled that Lipstadt had failed to prove some of her claims about Irving, including that he has a self-portrait of Hitler above his desk.

But he added that the unproved charges would not have "any material effect on Irving's reputation."

Irving, who lives in a $1.5 million apartment in London's Mayfair district says he has no other assets and now faces a bill for legal costs estimated at some $5 million.

After the verdict was announced, Irving said he would not be silenced.

"I will still continue to write what I find to be true history. I can't be intimidated," Irving told Sky television.

While welcoming the verdict, some observers are sorry that the trial ever took place.

"The facts of the Holocaust are the facts," said Sara Bloomfield, director of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. "We didn't need a trial to prove that the Holocaust happened."

A greater threat than Holocaust deniers are mainstream, nationalist leaders in Europe, said Randolph Braham, director of the Rosenthal Institute for Holocaust Studies at the City University of New York.

"They are respectable, believable leaders who don't deny the Holocaust, but distort it or denigrate it to cleanse a particular history," said Braham. The threat from such leaders should not be underestimated, he added.

"As George Orwell said, 'Those who control the present control the past; those who control the past control the future.'"

Victor in Holocaust trial speaks out

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The day before she emerged victorious from a libel lawsuit brought against her by a Holocaust denier, Passover preparations occupied Deborah Lipstadt's mind.

She had just arrived back in London from her home in Atlanta, where she had spent 10 days cleaning for Passover and preparing for the annual influx of family for her second seder.

"Here we are on the eve of Pesach, and what is Pesach all about: To teach your children," she said last week.

That, in essence, is how the Holocaust scholar perceives the significance of the legal ordeal she has endured.

Borrowing from the Haggadah, Lipstadt declared that "if, in the future, I can use this experience to teach and to write more history, then, in the spirit of the approaching holiday, dayeinu – it will be enough for me."

"I see this not only as a personal victory, but also as a victory for all those who speak out against hate and prejudice," Lipstadt said after the verdict was read.

While she had set out in her book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, to demolish Holocaust revisionism, Lipstadt said she was not looking for a fight.

"But once it came within the parameters of my life there was only one way I knew how to respond – and that was to fight back," she said in a JTA interview.

She did not seek a court battle that would overwhelm her professional and personal life. "I never would have gone into court with these people – I don't think it's productive," she said. "But once they came after me, I had no option but to fight with all my strength and with all my might."

Her only regret was that Holocaust survivors who had attended the trial were compelled to endure Irving's courtroom taunts.

She came close to tears when she recalled being "enveloped by survivors" who had approached her during the hearings to thank her for her stand against Irving.

Caught in the spotlight of a case that attracted standing-room-only public galleries and the constant glare of international media attention, Lipstadt maintained an internal tranquility by methodically ordering her time.

Days were spent in the courtroom; evenings at her apartment in London's West End, which was, ironically, just a few minutes walk from Irving's home.

"I'd come back to my apartment and generally change into exercise clothes. Sometimes I'd go and work out, then I'd answer e-mails, read transcripts, go over material that was going to be covered next day in the case.

In the early part of the evening would come calls from every place east of here – friends in Europe and Israel. Later would come calls from west of here. Then I would go to sleep. It was all very routine."

There were few emotional roller coasters, but she admitted that "a couple of times, when real ugliness came out in the court, it was revolting. I just wanted to go home and take a shower."

What kept her strong was what she described as her "A-Team" of lawyers, paralegals, researchers and experts, who, she said, would have been the toast of any university history department.

Then there was the flood of e-mails, letters, notes, cards and phone calls she received from well-wishers around the world – "Jews and non-Jews, people I know and people I don't, scholars and non-scholars, taxi drivers and hotel concierges, wanting to do things for me, wanting to be there, to help me."

But most moving and most touching, she said, was "the recognition by so many people – again, Jews and non-Jews – that while I was the person on the front line this was not my struggle alone; that it really was a struggle for truth, for memory, for doing the right thing."

Her contempt for Irving was boundless: "He is a liar and he is a bully," she said almost matter of factly.

"To manipulate the historical record in such a contemptuous fashion and to take what appeared to me to be such glee in making fun of survivors – that was debilitating. But the effect was to make me even more convinced I was doing the right thing."

Did she now regret anything in the book? "Yes," she replied. "I regret that I didn't know then what I know now, because then I would have been much more severe in what I wrote about Irving."

With the benefit of hindsight, would she have written the book at all?

"Without a doubt," she said emphatically, stressing each syllable. "To say I wouldn't have written it would be to give succor to scoundrels."

But even as her ordeal was ending, she warned: "The nightmare is not over. There is no end to the battle against racism, anti-Semitism and fascism."

Lipstadt's dream is to return to Emory University in Atlanta which has stood by her steadfastly, and to pick up where she left off before the start of the legal proceedings.

"I hope," she says, "that I can use this experience in what I do professionally – in what I do best and what my life has been all about: To teach, to teach, to teach."

Mossad warns of attack on Pope

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Israeli intelligence officials have warned their Italian counterparts that Islamic extremists may attack the Pope or the Vatican, in order to derail the Middle East peace process, according to a Rome newspaper.

Il Messaggero reported that Italian police beefed up security around the Vatican, including placing metal detectors around St. Peter's Square, in response to warnings from the Mossad, Israel's foreign intelligence service.

The first big test of the new security measures came last Sunday, when scores of thousands of pilgrims jammed St. Peter's Square and surrounding streets for Pope John Paul II's celebration of Palm Sunday Mass.

In recent weeks, Italian police had placed numerous airport-style screening devices – including walk-through metal detectors for people and conveyor-belt X-ray machines for bags – between the columns of the colonnade in the square.

Earlier this month, a Vatican spokesman said there had been no specific security threat. He said the measures were being taken because of the huge crowds expected for the Easter season.

He added that Italian police had wanted to install the metal detectors for some time, but the Vatican had resisted.

The year 2000, which marks the beginning of the third millennium of Christianity, is drawing millions of pilgrims to Rome. There had been earlier warnings of possible terrorism before Christmas and New Year's.

The success of the Pope's recent trip to the Holy Land was apparently one reason for the new warnings, the paper said.

Violence surges in Hebron

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper

JERUSALEM — Palestinians and Jews in Hebron say that in recent days there has been an upsurge in the number of violent incidents between them, with each side blaming the other for the violence.

Police said they are taking every complaint seriously.

According to Palestinian sources, Jewish settlers in Hebron are using the pre-holiday period to incite enough violence for the IDF to impose a curfew on the Arab residents. According to Jewish sources, including Noam Arnon, the spokesperson for Hebron's Jewish residents, "there's been an increase in the number of incidents in which Palestinians make sexual remarks to women from the Jewish community. Since the situation is getting worse, and people are fed up, when people see their women bothered, they tell the Arab it's not the way to behave."

Last Thursday, Palestinian and Jewish children scuffled near the Tomb of the Patriarchs. Two Jewish minors and one Palestinian were questioned by police.

The Week in Israel

April 10

• Immigration to Israel rose 38 percent last year with the arrival of 77,921 immigrants.

April 11

• Israel approved new tourism and housing projects in the Golan, including 200 housing units in Katzrin. The Israeli cabinet decided to allow further development in the area in the absence of serious negotiations with Syria.

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak met with U.S. President Bill Clinton in Washington to discuss the status of peace negotiations. During the meeting, Barak agreed to a greater U.S. presence in the negotiations. Clinton urged Barak to cancel the sale of an advanced radar system to China.

April 12

• While at an official state dinner in Jerusalem, Chinese President Jiang Zemin issued veiled criticism of American opposition to Israel's sale of advanced radar systems to China. Earlier in the day, Jiang visited Yad Vashem and donned a kippah when he placed the wreath at the eternal flame in the Hall of Remembrance.

April 13

• Barak and visiting French Defence Minister Alain Richard signed a defence co-operation deal in which Israel and France will invest in military research and development.

April 14

• Israel and Egypt agreed to try to clinch a deal on the export of Egyptian natural gas to the Jewish state. Negotiations over the gas sale have gone on for many years, mirroring the ups and downs of the regional peace process.

'I'm a bridge' says Ohr Olam founder

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

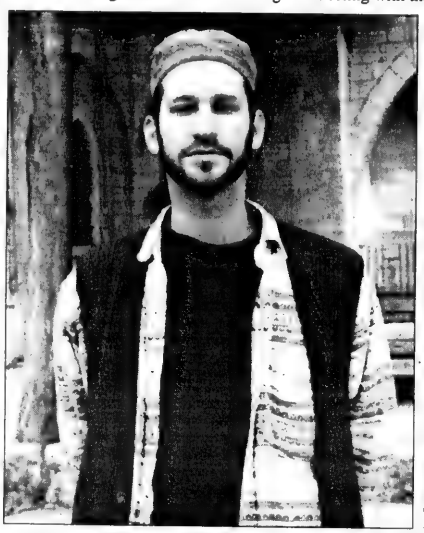
JERUSALEM — Hailing from a long line of rabbis, Azriel Cohen teaches the principles of Torah and Judaism. But he's not rabbinically ordained. Nor does he aspire to be.

100 paintings on his trips in India

Cohen is a different kind of teacher. "The yeshiva world has so much knowledge but people don't have access to it," says the former Toronto Ohr Chaim Yeshiva student. "I'm a bridge."

For Cohen, now a Jerusalemite, being able to share his love for Judaism and the teachings of the Torah with others makes him feel "blessed".

Cohen is the founder of Ohr Olam, an organization that aims to facilitate respectful encounters between Jews of different backgrounds who would normally not have the opportunity to interact with one another. His organization is based in Dharamshala, India.



Azriel Cohen

Cohen has been to India four times already. He's going again for Pesach.

Besides putting together a seder for the hundreds of travellers that, every year, make their way through Dharamshala, he'll also be checking up on how the community he created is doing.

"I thought travellers [who went to] India were crazy," he says. "The Jewish community thinks it's people on the fringe who are going there, but these people's souls are amazing. My own prejudices have been smashed; all my preconceptions are blown away."

Back at Eitz Chaim and Or Chaim schools in Toronto, Cohen says India was the farthest place from his mind. But living in Israel, inspired him to go there.

His family, who now live in Thornhill, hails from Jerusalem's Mea Shearim neighbourhood. His father, Avraham, Cohen says, "has a tremendous passion for learning." And, in fact, so do his mother, Devorah, his brothers Avinoam and Aaron, his sister Shulamit, and himself.

At the end of his yeshiva studies in Toronto, he came to study in Israel. Then he returned to Toronto, and later made his way to New York. There, he studied psychology at Yeshiva University and completed a master of fine arts at the School of Visual Arts.

In fact, art is a main part of who Cohen is. "As long as I've been able to hold a pencil, I've been painting. I always have a sketch book with me."

He estimates he's painted approximately 100 paintings on his trips in India.

From New York he moved to Israel, where he soon found he was one of very few artists never to have gone to India. "I wanted to crack this nut – see what's going on, [understand why so many Israelis go to India]," he says.

Then Chabad invited Cohen to join them on a mission to Nepal. He continued on to India.

With the support of the North American Jewish communities, Cohen set off to Dharamshala, the village of the Dalai Lama at the foothills of the Himalayas, to set up programs for Jewish travellers in India.

Michi Yosefi, with the support of the Israeli community, came with a similar vision. Since meeting in Dharamshala in 1997, Cohen and Yosefi have jointly and independently facilitated numerous programs for Jewish travellers in India and Nepal.

"It's where spiritual seekers are going," explains Cohen. "They're going to Jerusalem and Dharamshala."

Cohen estimates about 80 percent of the people from the West who come to Dharamshala are Jewish. "We drafted up a vision for creating a project for healing between Jews and Judaism," says Cohen, about the community he created with the help of an American couple he met there.

But, Cohen wasn't happy with simply declaring a Jewish community in Dharamshala, a Tibetan community. So, he arranged a meeting with the Tibetan leader, the Dalai Lama. "I wanted this community to be a kiddush Hashem."

Official recognition was very important for Cohen. He wanted his new community to "be Jews who live as part of God's world [who] are not an undercover mission."

At their meeting, Cohen asked the Dalai Lama's permission to set up a Jewish community in his village. Cohen says the Dalai Lama's reply was: "It is my pleasure. You are the chosen people. Not true?"

With this blessing, Cohen and the American couple – Mark, not Jewish, and Dara, Jewish – set about creating programs for travellers.

Today, weekly Shabbat dinners take place, and there is an open resource library with 200 volumes of Jewish texts in both Hebrew and English. Dara and Mark also run Purim, Chanukah, and High Holy Day programs. Cohen, meanwhile, fund-raises from Israel and North America to keep the Dharamshala Jewish community afloat.

Now, Cohen is set to leave Israel for his fifth trip to India. After all, Pesach is just around the corner and he has seders to prepare.

Monks, Christians, and anyone who is interested, often join the Jewish organized programs in India, he says.

As for the new community he's created, Cohen says: "There's no baggage in terms of how things have to be, no Jewish community – we're improvising. There's a vision and we're improvising. We're a fantasy land."

NYGH volunteers raising $1 million for the hospital

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About 1,000 North York General Hospital (NYGH) volunteers are donating $1 million to the hospital's $35-million Stand By Me campaign.

"I've been a volunteer for 30 years and I have no qualms about recommending this hospital," said Phyllis Sacks, president of the volunteers group and a resident of the Leslie-Sheppard area where the hospital is located.

The group, who volunteer at both NYGH and its Branson division, can have 100 volunteers on the hospital floors at any hour of the day. About 15 percent are men, and some are high school students who come in after school and during the summer.

The volunteers' $1-million pledge has brought the Stand By Me total raised so far to $12.5 million. The full cost of the redevelopment at the hospital is expected to be $127 million, of which $35 million is to be raised locally.

The volunteers raised the money through many endeavours, including their major effort, the 650-square-foot gift shop on the main floor. A total of 120 people staff the shop, which operates every day, with restricted hours on the weekend. Gross sales reached $500,000 last year, through purchases of gifts, paperbacks and babies' wear knitted by the volunteers.

The projects committee raises money through white elephant sales; hand-made greeting cards, which brought in $5,000 last year; and raffles for quilts, which raised $9,000.

The largest group of volunteers, 150, staff the information desk from 8 a.m. to 9 p.m., 365 days a year. There are always two people at the desk, operating computers with the latest data on patients, and handling diverse jobs including delivering X-rays or other items to staff on other floors.

"We're threatening to put a pedometer on some of them to show how many miles they do every day," Sacks said.

A number of volunteers staff the increasingly busy day surgery department, bringing ice chips and drinks to patients and wheeling patients into and out of the unit. They also work in the always busy emergency department and in other out-patient services.

Three days a week they work in the new breast cancer diagnostic clinic.

Sacks describes the volunteers at the 160-bed Seniors Health Centre as "extra-special" in their devotion to the residents. "They work with the occupational therapists, help with feeding and run social events."

Public schools in the area are being visited by members of the school presentation group. They bring stethoscopes and nurses uniforms to kindergarten and Grade 1 students to acquaint them with what they will see at a hospital, Sacks says.

The $1-million donation is a four-year pledge, and though they are only in the second year, the volunteers have already raised $400,000.

Help prevent your child from choking

By LISA WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

Comment

When I interned at the Hospital for Sick Children, I saw first hand many terrifying incidents of young children who had choked on food.

There are so many things in this world that we cannot protect our children from, but this is one thing that we can prevent.

As you are aware, choking can lead to tragic outcomes and can be fatal. However, many choking incidents in children are easily preventable if the most dangerous foods are avoided.

As a dietitian/nutritionist, I would have thought most parents were aware that some of the following foods are among the most common causes of choking in children under four: popcorn, whole grapes, unsliced hot dogs (sliced in rounds as opposed to quarters), whole nuts, hard candies and marshmallows.

I recently had an experience that convinced me otherwise, however, and I would like to ensure that CJN readers are well educated in this area.

I was at the end of a music program that I was taking with my 16-month-old daughter. At the last class, the instructor asked us to bring a snack to share with the class, so that we could have a party for the finale.

The only request made, obviously, was that the snacks be nut free.

The children in the class ranged from 12 to 24 months, although the majority were 12 to 18 months.

When everyone laid their snacks out on the "buffet table," and I saw what was being offered, I was astonished. Two people had brought popcorn – one caramel, one buttered. Another mother brought fruit, including whole grapes; still another snack was sourdough pretzel nibs.

All of these snacks are simply airway plugs for young children.

I selected a variety of safer looking cookies for my daughter, and left the class that day in sheer amazement.

If you're wondering what snack I brought in, it was a popular brand of all-natural, oatmeal raisin cookies.

Please take the necessary steps to ensure that the food you are offering to your toddlers and preschoolers is safe. Slice grapes, cherry tomatoes and hot dogs lengthwise; avoid round hard foods; and carefully select snacks that you are bringing into schools or child programs.

It only takes one second for someone to choke, and just because your child managed an un-sliced hot dog in the past, does not mean he or she won't choke next time.

Don't take the chance. A child's life is at stake.

Her Surprising Strategy Will Astound You!
"I know how 'fat' feels. The stuggle to get up off a sofa. The sting of unshed tears. No one deserves to be that unhappy. That's why I'm sharing my weight loss discovery with you."
I tried losing weight on my own. You know the routine. Tomorrow I'll start my diet.
I couldn't get throught the afternoon without a snack.
One day I overheard my mom talking about local folks who had lost 35, 71, and even 105 lbs. with hypnosis. That got my attention!
I picked up the phone and called.
I lost 7 lbs. the first week. That's when my skepticism vanished. 6 1/2 months later I had lost my entire 55 lbs! It was easy. My dress size dropped from a plump 22 to a trim size 12.
Losing my weight with hypnosis was the smartest decision of my life.

Author's debut is a thrilling 18th-century mystery

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

When author David Liss was researching his doctoral thesis on finance in 18th-century British fiction, he failed to find a source that told him precisely what he wanted to know about the rise of the stock market and how this new type of finance affected everyday people.

So, as he says in the historical note to his debut novel, A Conspiracy of Paper, he wrote one.

A Conspiracy of Paper (Random House, $37) is a lush mystery full of conspiracies, colourful characters, plot twists and an excellent feel for the period.

The novel is set in London just prior to the 1720 South Sea Bubble, the first stock market crash in the English-speaking world.

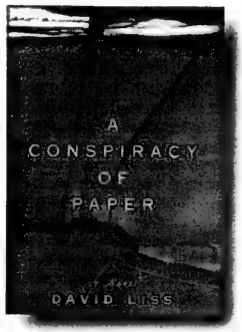
Benjamin Weaver is a Jewish former boxing champion who now makes a living as a "thief-taker," a sort-of 18th-century private detective hired by the rich and famous to locate their stolen items. (At the time England didn't have a police force.)

This character is an excellent way for Liss, also Jewish, to describe both the seedy side of London's underworld full of thugs, drunks and prostitutes and the society of the well-to-do upper classes who hire him.

Also, being Jewish, Weaver exists in another stratum altogether. Like all Jews, wealthy or not, Weaver was always an outsider. Even wealthy Jewish businessmen had to tread carefully so not to offend their "English hosts." The expulsion of the Jews from England 500 years earlier, was a reminder of what could happen again.

Investigating the mysterious circumstances around the death of his estranged father, a stock-jobber, Weaver is drawn into the new world of high finance and stock speculation, and a battle between the Bank of England and the South Sea Company to finance the debt of the nation.

Along the way, Weaver is reunited with his uncle, an observant Jew who invites him for Sabbath dinner. Weaver's re-entry into the Jewish community is the sub-plot of this novel. Weaver has long ago given up any notion of being Jewish. Many times, Englishmen mock Jews and Judaism in front of him, not realizing that he is Jewish.



And like many assimilated Jews, Weaver bears some resentment to the Eastern European Jewish immigrants, what he calls "Tudesco" Jews:

"I should like to say that I formed no prejudice against the Tudescos simply because I thought their appearance and language strange, but the truth is that I found such men as this peddler an embarrassment – I believed them to cast our people in a shockingly bad light and I felt ashamed of their poverty and ignorance and helplessness."

Weaver is based on a real character, Daniel Mendoza, and many other details are based on historical events and people. Weaver's underworld rival in this novel is Jonathan Wild, a real person who was probably England's first crime lord. Many of the settings in this novel are also based on historical landmarks.

And the rise of stock market speculation and the conversion of the source of wealth from land to paper was happening around this time.

The authenticity in this book is also helped by Weaver's command of 18th-century cadence. The book reads the way a novel of the period is supposed to, but without much of the verbosity and idiosyncrasies often found in that genre.

Conspiracy of Paper is an excellent mystery that will keep you guessing until the end. Liss is already planning another financial mystery, this one set in 17th-century Amsterdam, but hasn't ruled out returning to his Jewish "detective' for a sequel.

Losing The Dead:

Survivor's account distinguished by vivid characterizations

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Lisa Appignanesi, a child of Holocaust survivors who grew up in Montreal, recounts her parents' wartime experiences in Losing the Dead, a family memoir that takes the form of a personal quest of research and discovery.

Appignanesi (nee Borensztejn), born in postwar Poland and now living in London, has already proved her literary prowess with several works of non-fiction and a handful of best-selling novels, including last year's The Dead of Winter.

In Losing the Dead, she applies her adept skills to telling a three-generational family history that largely focuses on the Holocaust years and a tale of survival outside of the camps.

Her mother came from the Polish town of Grodzisk Mazowiecki, her father from Pruszkow, both a short distance southwest of Warsaw. The author recounts their strange behavior around authority figures; their need, like so many survivors, to conceal even as they reveal aspects of themselves and their histories. Appignanesi describes other behavioural elements of what has become known and studied as the "child-of-survivors" syndrome.

Given that many similar survivor accounts already exist, what distinguishes Losing the Dead, besides its value as testimony, are the vivid characterizations. Appignanesi excels at painting in-depth psychological portraits of her parents.

The author asserts that writing this book was a means for her to exorcise certain familial ghosts from her psyche by shining upon them the light of knowledge, which she attains through family interviews and trips to Poland and Israel.

In one iridescent moment, she also seems to encounter the ghost of Warsaw's main synagogue which the Nazis destroyed in 1943. Glancing one sunny day from the window of the Jewish Historical Institute next door, she sees not the expected modern glass tower that replaced the former Jewish landmark, but a building of grey stone that to her looks uncannily like the synagogue itself.

"I stare at the building, and see a dark-haired woman move closer to the window to look back at me," she writes. "It takes me a long moment to recognize my reflected image."

Losing the Dead belongs to a literary genre defined by recent books such as Journey to Varna, by Elaine Kalman Naves; Where She Came From, by Helen Epstein; and Konin: A Quest, by Theo Richmond.

Presented by authors keen on recapturing a lost ancestral world, such works focus on people and places from the vanquished Jewish civilization of Eastern Europe. In essence, each offers a sort of cultural bridge between the rootless present and a richly storied, albeit devastated past.

The tellers present their findings as a personal journey across geographical, temporal and psychological space. The result is both history and mythology – and often approaches genealogy as well.

Anyone interested in the Holocaust era will appreciate Losing the Dead as a well-crafted memoir. It is published in Canada by McArthur & Co.

Vanished 1913 documentary being screened at AGO

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In 1913, a year before World War I turned the Middle East on its head and transformed Palestine – an Ottoman backwater – into a British colony, a Russian Jewish film director named Noah Sokolovsky showed his new documentary at the eleventh Zionist Congress in Vienna. It was titled The Life of the Jews in Palestine. Mysteriously, it vanished in 1914 after being screened in Poland.

Three years ago, the original nitrate print was found in Paris, and then painstakingly reconstructed by the Centre national de la cinematographie in co-operation with the Israeli Film Archive and Cinematheque Francaise.

On Sunday, April 23 at 1 p.m., The Life of the Jews of Palestine will be shown by Cinematheque Ontario at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall.

The 78-minute film, a classic of the silent cinema, is subtitled in English, French and Hebrew and unfolds to a pleasing musical score.

From a historical point of view, it is nothing less than a gem, a treasure trove of montages of the lives of Jewish settlers in a struggling land still relatively innocent of the harsh political turmoil to come.

It begins as Russian Jews board a ship in Odessa bound for Jaffa. Presumably, they plan to settle in Palestine, whose Jewish population in 1913 was about 60,000. The vessel sets out on its voyage after fond farewells from the passengers. It passes Constantinople, with its rolling hills, fortifications, towers and mosques.

The camera then pans on newly constructed residential buildings in Tel Aviv, founded in 1909, and on one of its grandest thoroughfares, Rothschild Boulevard. The sand dunes facing the Mediterranean Sea beckon in the distance.

From a contemporary vantage point, The Life of the Jews in Palestine brims with prosaic but amazing scenes. Young women mill around the courtyard of a teachers' seminary in Jaffa. Students file out of the Gymnasium Herzliya in Tel Aviv.

Men harvest oranges in the citrus groves of Petach Tikvah, and a quaint camel caravan delivers the loaded crates to a terminal in Jaffa.

In Hadera, farmers ride horses, Yemenite Jews work the fields, and workers in pith hats thresh grain. Jewish and Arab stonemasons build the Technion in Haifa. Worshippers leave a synagogue in Zikron Ya'akov after services. And in Rosh Pina, high in the Galilee, Arabs and Jews pick almonds from a tree.

Chassidim walk hurriedly to the Western Wall (referred to here as the Wailing Wall), while students at Jerusalem's Bezalel School of Art draw sketches from a live model in Arab head-dress.

In Nes Ziona, a beekeeper tastes honey, and in Rishon LeZion, pedestrians stroll amid luxuriant date palms and labourers grapple with heavy barrels at a Carmel Mizrachi winery. In Rehovot, we witness Passover celebrations and the launch of the Maccabiah Games.

We catch fleeting glimpses of a few prestate personalities: Meir Dizengoff, a future mayor of Tel Aviv; Moshe Shertok (Sharett), Israel's prime minister in the mid-1950s; and Yosef Trumpeldor, a hero in the annals of Zionism.

Judging from the clips, Palestine's physical landscape is a mix of the bucolic and the desolate.

Zikron Ya'akov, in the folds of hills and dales, looks positively idyllic. Tiberias, as seen from the Sea of Galilee, appears rundown. The old city of Jerusalem is a jumble of ancient stone buildings. Rosh Pina offers panoramic vistas of pristine valleys. Hebron is a biblical tableau.The banks of the peaceful Jordan River are thick with vegetation. The Dead Sea is placid. Jericho seems dead to the world.

The Life of the Jews in Palestine, in short, is a bracing journey into a country which has changed a thousand-fold and reinvented itself since 1913.

For that reason alone, its vibrant moving images speak eloquently to incredulous viewers in 2000.

Sell-through videos easy to find

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Every time a column of mine appears, readers ask where they can find the videos I write about. My usual answer is that you ask your video store manager to order them.

If that doesn't work, you can surf the Net. There are a number of Web sites you can check, such as Facet, facets.org, Big Star, bigstar.com, Amazon amazon.com, or, reel.com.

Now let me tell you about a few videos that have just been released for sell-through or will be released shortly.

The Truce, the excellent film detailing Italian philosopher Primo Levi's prolonged journey home from Auschwitz, has just reached the sell-through market.

This film was screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival about two years ago, and features a brilliant performance by John Turturro in the lead role.

Also being released at a low price is the Holocaust drama The Island on Bird Street, the story of a young boy's survival in a Jewish ghetto while waiting for his father's return.

Both these videos are released by Alliance Atlantis and if you can't find them in a store, you can probably order them through the Alliance Web site, alliancevideo.com/en/now-available-to-wn.asp.

Also re-released at sell-through is Getting Away With Murder. This film has a terrific cast consisting of Dan Aykroyd, Lily Tomlin, Bonnie Hunt and Jack Lemmon. Unfortunately, the film is not as good as its cast. It tells the story of an alleged war criminal and whether he actually committed the crimes of which he is accused.

Towards the end of April, two other titles are being re-released. Family Prayers tells the story of a young Jewish boy (played by Tzvi Ratner-Stauber) preparing for his bar mitzvah, and the lessons he learns from his rabbi and parents.

The boy's father (Joe Mantegna) is a compulsive gambler who can never hang onto any money and drives the family into poverty. Paul Reiser plays the rabbi in whom the boy confides.

Beyond Silence is not a Jewish film as such. It is a German film that tells the story of a young girl growing up in a household where both of her parents are deaf. She becomes interested in music and takes up of the clarinet.

When she attends a Giora Feidman concert and hears Klezmer music for the first time, she becomes determined to make music her career. This wonderful – but little scene film– is also available from Alliance.

Arts & Travel

A melange of jumbled humanity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BANGKOK — A study in sharp and seemingly immutable contrasts, Bangkok is at once alluring and repelling.

It's a kaleidoscopic city of ethereal temples and flyblown shacks, of teeming outdoor markets and sedate upscale malls, of Armani-clad yuppies and bedraggled beggars.

Bangkok's signature sight, the Grand Palace, is a walled compound of exquisite temples, ornate buildings, fanciful murals and soaring statuary reflecting Thai, Indian, Italian and British architectural styles. Formerly the seat of the monarchy, a revered institution in Thailand, the Grand Palace complex is a vast outdoor museum which never fails to draw large crowds.

The National Museum, which lies around the corner, is renowned for its permanent exhibits of royal regalia, antiquated weaponry, textiles, ceramics and photographs. It offers a bird's-eye view of Thai history down through the ages.

Several blocks away, the face of grinding Third World poverty abruptly greets a visitor. Along a muddy canal (khlong) which cuts through a dilapidated neighbourhood of narrow lanes, ramshackle huts and rotting mounds of garbage, a sleepy young man, having awoken from a night's sleep, rises from a straw mat, rolls it up neatly, then nonchalantly urinates into the water. As he does so, a bus belching acrid diesel fuel roars by, drowning out the singsong of birds, perched in a canopy of lush tropical trees.

Much of Bangkok, gridlocked by incessant traffic and choked by dangerously high levels of pollution, is blighted by a network of overpasses and marred by vistas of crumbling buildings. In this respect, Bangkok, with an unofficial population of about eight million, is a concrete jungle, a Southeast Asian version of Cairo.

But there is another side to Bangkok, a gentler side best exemplified by two buildings, the Vimanmek teak mansion and the Jim Thompson residence.

Billed as the world's largest golden teak building, the L-shaped, three-storey Vimanmek house was the abode of King Rama V in the early 1900s. Closed in the mid-1930s, the mansion, set on beautifully manicured grounds bursting with flowers and graced by palms, was reopened as a museum 18 years ago. A one hour tour reveals antiques, art treasures and the personal effects of the late monarch.

Jim Thompson was an American intelligence officer who settled in Thailand shortly after World War II. Almost single-handedly, Thompson revived the long-neglected silk weaving industry. He gained further renown by collecting parts of six derelict teak homes and reassembling them on a leafy lot in the noisy centre of Bangkok.

Representing the best of traditional Thai architecture, Jim Thompson house, erected a full floor above the ground as a precaution against flooding, contains a formidable collection of Thai and Chinese porcelain, prints, figurines and old maps. The second-storey patio, adorned with flowers and plants, offers a view of Bangkok's modern skyline.

Bangkok's Grand Palace complex.

Bangkok's street markets are a sight to behold. The weekend Chatuchak market, with 8,600 vendors' stalls, is a mecca for shoppers. They come here in droves, buying fruits and vegetables and bargain basement priced clothes, amulets, musical instruments, pets, handicrafts and flowers.

The outdoor markets in Chinatown and in the adjacent Indian district are just as congested and colourful, attracting a melange of jumbled humanity flowing in and out of shops filled with household goods and trinkets, and redolent of exotic spices, fragrant herbs, dried fruits, fish, meat and chicken.

The few floating markets still left in Bangkok are strictly geared to the tourist trade, and do not rate a visit. Far more authentic ones can be found outside Bangkok, especially in Damnoen Saduak, 104 kilometres southwest of the city.

Bangkok's night markets are worth exploring, and one of the best is in Pat Pong, which happens to be the red-light district.

Amid the seedy nightclubs, strip joints and massage parlours, sunburned tourists pick their way past hawkers selling jerseys, shirts, trousers and souvenirs, brushing aside beggars who shake cardboard boxes tingling with loose change.

The World Trade Center, the polar opposite of Pat Pong on the other side of town, is the epitome of a North American mall, with underground parking, brand-name stores, a duty-free shop, an ice rink and a food court with chic restaurants.

In truth, the World Trade Center is an insulated, air-conditioned island of privilege in a cacophonous metropolis gripped by poverty.

As you step outside on the pavement, breathing in the oppressive muggy air which never seems to dissipate, you stumble upon another kind of reality – a dishevelled teenaged mother cradling a grimy infant in one arm and holding aloft a tin cup in the other.

So this is Bangkok, modern and backward, spiritual and material, and never less than riveting.

Instrumental composer can't be pigeon-holed

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — You probably won't catch composer and pianist John Herberman on stage any time soon, but you will undoubtedly hear his music.

The award-winning artist likes to write from the comfort of his Toronto home and prefers working in a recording studio to performing on a live stage. So it is only fitting that his 20th CD is for a company called Solitudes.

'Music brings peace'

Since 1994, Herberman, 46, has been working at Solitudes, a Canadian-owned music company that produces and distributes a wide range of instrumental works to alternative markets. With this association, he has garnered four gold records and two Juno nominations for his efforts.

A look at the artist's latest CDs shows that his style can not be pigeon-holed: Beethoven, Forever By the Sea, In the Midst of Angels, World Voyage, Espirtu de los Andes, I Got Big Band Rhythm, Inspired by Monet, the 1999 Juno-nominated Celtic Dance and the 2000 Juno-nominated Piano Cascades.

"I like it when they say, 'John can you do this?' and I have to walk away and learn how to do it. I really enjoy that," he says. "For the South American record, Espirtu de los Andes, I did a lot of listening to South American music, which I love. Then on the technical side, I had to pull out the elements that make this music unique; this is really the essence of what gives us its flavour.

"Going way back, my musical sensibilities are very much in line with what the Solitudes project is all about," says Herberman. "It is music that tries to bring peace to people's lives. It is gentle on them without being banal, trite or cynical. It's good quality music. I very much like doing the Solitudes stuff and hope that continues long into the future.

"I just had a neighbour come to my front door who was visiting a relative dying of cancer. She was using one of my records, Forest Piano, for consolation. It keeps her sane when the going gets tough. I'm very pleased to be able to do that kind of thing, as opposed to using my skill, whatever that is, to sell stuff for people."

In 1982, Herberman, a graduate of the University of Toronto's faculty of music and Rochester, N.Y.'s Eastman School of Music's film scoring and arranging program, gave up a teaching position at Oakville Trafalgar High School to pursue composition full time.

He was soon writing and recording music for television, film, commercials, industrial shows, vocal and instrumental jazz and live theatre.

Herberman led a bar mitzvah band for seven years, but he felt that musically it was not where he was heading. Still he counts it as a good experience that has paid off, he says.

His commercial credits include scores for Air Canada, Bell Canada, American Motors, Dempsters Foods, Microsoft Inc., Ontario Hydro, Royal Bank of Canada, Toshiba, Standard Broadcasting, Shell Oil and Playtex.

He continues to write commercially, sometimes partnering with fellow Solitudes label mate, Juno award-winner David Bradstreet.

He was the music director and principal composer for the children's television series, Once Upon A Hamster.

"This was a show I grew up with. When the creator Paul Sutherland decided to do 65 more episodes, I wrote 90 percent of the music." Herberman says. "The show has won countless children's programming awards all over North America."

Other musical scores have included Family Passions, Cleared for Take-Off and the Emmy Award-winning CBS miniseries Joan of Arc.

"When you mention Joan of Arc, people are interested in talking to you. It had a very high profile and opened some doors for me. It was a huge project, a team of five composers were assembled," he says, "I was lucky to be one of the people to be asked."

In addition, the composer designed the sound and music for Ottawa's Canada in Space Exhibit at the Museum of Science and Technology and the National Aviation Museum.

Herberman feels blessed to be able to wake up every morning, look out the window of his three-bedroom home and write music all day. He allows himself time off in the summer to indulge in do-it-yourself home repairs and canoe tripping.

For information on Herberman's CDs, visit the Solitudes Web site at: www.solitudes.com.

John Herberman's music provides a mystical feeling.

High school goaltender a Toronto all-star

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Odds are that 10 or 15 years ago, a typical teenage girl would never have dreamed of donning 40 or 50 pounds of hot and smelly goaltending equipment to face down a bunch of guys shooting a hard rubber puck. And then kibbitzing with them about it later.

It's a measure of how far women's participation in sports has come, that for Flora Vineberg, it's all in a day's work. As far as she's concerned, hockey today is as much a girl's game as it is one for the boys.

Vineberg, 16, is one of a new breed of young female athletes who are flocking to hockey in growing numbers. Enrollment in organized women's hockey has grown by 600 percent in recent years and Vineberg has been in the forefront, playing competitive shinny with boys since she was six.

In those days Vineberg played as a forward, but about five or six years ago, she found herself a niche as a goalie and she's never looked back.

Recently, her stellar performance for her school team, the North Toronto Collegiate Norsewomen, earned her a spot on the girls hockey GTA all-star team, as selected by the Toronto Sun.

Vineberg also backstops the Beatrice Junior Aeros, an intermediate level team in the Ontario Women's Hockey Association (OWHA). The Aeros is an elite team playing at the highest level for girls aged 16-20.

Aeros coach Dave Pirie considers "Vinnie" one of the best goalies in the league. "She's got very quick lateral movement and a very good glove hand...She tries to bring out the best in everybody at practice."

Her statistics bear him out. During the regular season, Vinnie posted a sizzling 1.12 goals against average.

Just as important as her technical abilities, are the intangibles that make her a key member of the team, Pirie said.

Vineberg has a great attitude and a fine work ethic. "She knows what she wants and she works hard for it."

As far as Vineberg is concerned, her ultimate objective is pretty clear: "My supreme goal in life is to play for the national team."

Like many other girls her age, she's enthralled by the success and respect garnered by the national team, which recently won the world championship thanks to an overtime win versus arch rivals, the United States.

While she'll have plenty of competition for the puck-stopping role on the national team – goaltending is one of Canada's strongest positions – Vineberg has other options to consider. She will probably receive offers for a full athletic scholarship from U.S. colleges, Pirie said. And there's always the chance she'll decide to move up in the Aeros organization and play for the senior teams, one of the elite teams in the country.

Behind the mask: Flora Vineberg playing last year for the Lady Marlies Vineberg got her first exposure to hockey at around five or six by playing shinny at a friend's birthday party. Her parents enrolled her in the Forest Hill House League where the kids take turns playing each position. When she recorded a shut-out in her first game, "I said I like it.

"It was pretty easy for me. I was so excited about it, and I was good at it."

At age 12 she joined the (boys) Toronto Aeros A level team in the MTHL and on occasion she got called to play AA hockey as a spare as well.

The better AA players didn't post that much of a problem for her, she recalls. "It was all new to me, so you have to rise to the challenge."

At about 13 she switched to the Ontario Women's Hockey Association (OWHA) and played for the Toronto Lady Marlies for three seasons. Last year, the team went to the city and provincial championships, winning both, as well as seven or eight other tournaments. In the provincial championship against the Ottawa Capitals, Vineberg recorded a shut-out and the Marlies scored with 34 seconds left to record a 1-0 victory.

This year, Vineberg pulled on the pads for the Norsewomen and she practiced with the Northmen, the school's boys team. She also played goalie for the boys floor hockey team in a co-ed league that consists primarily of boys.

"It was fun," she said. "They really liked that I came out for it. They say, if you're good enough, why is it a big deal?"

Vineberg's led the Norsewomen to three city championships, recording a shutout in the semi-finals this season versus Lawrence Park. She then backstopped the team to a 4-2 win over arch rivals Humberside in the final.

Pesach Food Quiz

By JORDAN MAX

I can't think of eight days of the year when we are more conscious of what we eat than Pesach, and so, here to take your mind off what you can't eat during Pesach, is my Pesach Food Quiz.

Chametz is:

a. The result of one of five grains that ferments and rises after 18 minutes of contact with water, which must be removed from your house and sold to a non-Jew.

b. A deadly intergalactic virus that invades your home and clings to everything in sight, which can only be destroyed by the full array of industrial strength cleaners.

c. The latest weight-loss drug.

d. A kosher pig that lives in trees.

Kitniyot are:

a. Legumes etc. that are similar to chametz and forbidden for Ashkenazim but not for Sephardim.

b. Another one of those crazy Ashkenazi customs.

c. Anything that doesn't taste like cardboard and is therefore forbidden.

d. That crazed look that your children get after too much consumption of chocolate and other chazzerai you wouldn't allow them to have the rest of the year, which you let them have because you feel guilty for what they're missing.

What convenience food items are not yet available in a kosher L'Pesach version?

a. Pancakes.

b. Pizza crust.

c. Bagel mix.

d. Toast.

Shmurah matzah is:

a. Matzah made from flour which has been guarded since harvest to prevent its becoming chametz due to contact with water for more than 18 minutes.

b. More expensive per pound than most kosher cuts of meat.

c. Matzah eaten by on-duty security guards. (What kind of an occupation is that for a Jewish boy?)

d. The most pressure-sensitive substance known to man.

The term Gebrokts refers to:

a. A stringency which prohibits any contact between matzah products and water for the first seven days of Pesach.

b. Another one of those crazy Ashkenazi customs.

c. How you feel when you finally manage to sit down after a month of Pesach cleaning and the last 72 continuous hours of cooking.

d. Your financial situation after all that Pesach food shopping.

Last Laugh

Some people spend Pesach in a kosher L'Pesach hotel because:

a. They want to escape from Pesach cleaning and/or are deathly afraid of chametz.

b. That's how Moshe Rabbeinu and B'nei Yisrael did it coming out of Mizrayim.

c. They want to fulfil the Torah commandment to eat matzah by eating around the clock for eight days and nights.

d. If the Hershkowitzes can afford to go to a Pesachdik hotel, why can't we?

At the seder, Eliyahu Hanavi comes to each seder table to:

a. Drink a bit of wine from a special cup set aside for him, and possibly announce the coming of Mashiach.

b. Spill the red wine on the heirloom tablecloth, then watch the hockey playoffs on TV.

c. Get a night out from Mrs. Hanavi on his souped-up T-bird chariot.

d. Check hechshers and the dessert selection.

Which of the following activities cannot be done with matzah on Chol Hamoed?

a. Create an edible jigsaw puzzle.

b. Play a game of frisbee.

c. Feed it to the goldfish and watch them sink to the bottom of the fish tank.

d. Soak up kitchen spills and ocean oil slicks

THE CAPLAN FAMILY EXTEND BEST WISHES FOR A HAPPY & HEALTHY PASSOVER

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I am 17 years old and my family is bothering me to get my driver's licence. I am in no rush to drive because I get to where I have to go by getting rides from either my mom or dad or my friends' moms or dads. My parents said I have to pay for part of my lessons and part of my insurance and I don't want to. Things are just fine the way they are as far as I'm concerned. How do I get them off my back?

Driveless Teen

Dear Driveless Teen,

So, you have finally reached the driving age. What is interesting about turning 16 or 17, is that teenagers can have different attitudes and views about getting a licence. Some teens jump at the chance of going through the variety of stages that will allow them to have the freedom they have been dreaming of, while others tend to take things slowly. One isn't necessarily better than the other; they are just different attitudes.

In certain cases, parents may feel that their child wants to learn how to drive, so they try to encourage their teen and help them go about obtaining the licence. Maybe your parents simply expected that you would want to learn how to drive, so they are making comments to let you know they will help you out.

However, it is important for you to make them aware that you don't really have any desire to learn how to drive right now. Is it possible that they are unaware of your true feelings on the issue?

If you've spoken to them already and they know how you feel, yet they are still bothering you about getting that little piece of plastic, then approach them again and explain to them that you are content and satisfied with your driving situation. If your parents feel the need for you to start lessons, then maybe you can start and work through the lessons at a slow, gradual pace.

Finally, if you are really upset about having to pay for the classes and insurance, discuss it with your parents and you might be able to arrive at another solution. Being honest and open with your parents will help you both in understanding each other's wishes and desires. With that in mind, remember that knowing how to drive is an important skill you should eventually learn.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto

HAPPY PASSOVER

The way to say fine tailoring

A veritable readers' feast

Paraphrasing Proverbs 25:11 that "a word fitting written is like apples of gold in settings of silver it is with great pleasure and pride that we prese for the quieter, more reflective moments this Pesac holiday, The Fourth Annual Literary Supplemen a veritable feast of golden apples in silver settings.

The response to our call for original works of prose ar poetry was deeply gratifying. We received more submissio this year than ever before and more from "first-timers" tha ever before.

Choosing which of the offerings to publish was a respo sibility that I tried to fulfil mindful of the sensibilities of th writers as well as of the quality of the writings. I regret tha we could not publish more material. The key limiting facto of course, as always, was space.

As I read through the many submissions, prose and poetr I was struck, yet again, as I was in preceding years, by the i tensity of the emotions and, one might even add, the urgenc of the expression of the emotions that infuse the works.

As in previous years, the Holocaust was a recurring them in the submissions we received – and not only in the work of survivor-age writers. It appeared frequently in the work of obviously younger writers, of the generation of the chi dren and even the grandchildren of survivors.

When you assemble with your families and your friend for the seder, when your eyes glide around the table, bear i mind the bittersweet observation of Judith Shahar whose poe A Wonderful Dream appears in these pages:

> The holidays!
> The remembrance of bliss
> And celebration
> Rises above the deep regret
> Of the passing
> Of all I loved so well
> Even in dreams
> My heart's eye
> Cannot let go my tears.

In addition to original prose and poetry, we are pleased also publish the photographs deemed to be the winners of th Photofest: Jewish Life in Canada National Photo Contest spo sored by UIA Federations Canada, Jewish federations acro Canada and The CJN.

Congratulations to the writers, the photographers and, abov all, the readers, who we believe are the real beneficiaries o our selections. It is our fervent hope that this supplement wi add to your enjoyment of Pesach. Chag samayach. The edito

EXTEND THEIR GOOD WISHES FOR A HAPPY PASSOVER

Ma Nishtanah

By MARLENE EISNER

Ruth put the box of dishes down on the hall table. In a short while, her guests would arrive and she wanted everything to be perfect. And why shouldn't it be? Hadn't she hosted a Passover seder in her house every year since she got married? Why should this night be any different?

The wood floors of the spacious four-room apartment had been swept, the sinks in both bathrooms scrubbed, pictures dusted and straightened and the Pesach silverware polished.

In the kitchen, wax paper lined the counters, which were covered with freshly baked sponge cakes and boxes of matzah meal. The house was filled with the savoury aroma of roasting chicken, simmering beef brisket and hearty chicken soup, a rich blend that wafted over Ruth like a poultice, soothing and warm.

By the time evening rolled around, everyone would be sitting around the table, all 17 of them, including Great-Aunt Lottie and cousin Marty, ready for the first night. All that was left to be done, was to put away the chametz dishes.

"Ma, how about I come in to Montreal a few days early, without Dave and the kids, so I can help?" Sandra had said last week from her home in Toronto. "I don't like that you're doing everything yourself. You know, Rhona should be ashamed of herself, not coming over to help you with the dishes and the shopping."

"Sandra, Rhona can't come to help. What with the new baby and her two little ones, she has enough to do. And you too, maidela, you have your family to take care of. Don't worry about me. I've been preparing for Passover since before you were born. I can do it with my eyes shut. I'm just happy you're coming. It's going to be a wonderful Passover."

But making the house ready had taken longer than Ruth anticipated, now that Henry wasn't home to give her a hand. She hated to admit how tired she was.

Ruth reached her arms around the box, lifted it, and waddled slowly across the living room toward the balcony. She would have to store the chametz dishes outside this year. It was Henry's job to take the dishes downstairs to the locker room for the eight days of Passover, and it was his job to bring them back upstairs. But Henry was no longer part of the routine they had so joyfully established 50 years ago as newlyweds.

The air was crisp and fresh on her face as Ruth opened the sliding doors. Her back creaked and her knees almost gave way, but she bent down slowly, put the box on the concrete floor and pushed it under the white garden table.

She and Henry had spent many a summer night eating dinner, the sounds of the traffic 10 stories below muffled by the cement barrier of the balcony. Ruth brushed a loose strand of greying hair from her eyes, paused to take a breath, picked up a small box and went back inside.

The dining-room table was set, the beige and eggshell blue plates a gentle contrast to the navy blue tablecloth. The gleaming silverware stood at attention beside each setting.

At the centre of the table, Eliyahu's copper wine goblet sat in a patient vigil for his ghostly appearance, and the seder plate, with its concave circles to house sprigs of parsley, cooked egg, shank bone and bitter herbs, lay at its place at the head.

"Who will lead the seder this year?" Ruth thought as she opened the box of Haggadahs. On the top of the pile lay a larger book bound in a finely crafted silver cover, ornate with symbols and Hebrew lettering – a gift purchased in Israel so many years ago. Henry's Haggadah.

He had proudly led every seder, always in Hebrew, guiding the family through the familiar ritual of answering the four questions, of why this night was different from every other.

Ruth placed the book at the head of the table. Its cover shone with a matt-like glow. She traced her fingers lightly over the lettering, her mind wandering back to other Passovers, her memories filled with the low murmur of prayer and the muffled chatter of children.

She saw herself at the table dressed in a simple black dress, her back straight and strong, her shoulder-length brown hair dark and shiny, her lips a slash of red. Beside her sat Rhona and Sandra, little girls wiggling restlessly in their seats, surrounded by their bubbies and zaydes, great-aunts, uncles and cousins, so many of them now gone or moved away.

And Henry. Ruth saw Henry, leading it all, dark wavy hair shaping his thin, handsome face, his sharp, intelligent blue eyes watching, waiting for everyone to quiet down so he could continue.

Ruth wiped a tear as it slid down her cheek. "Stop it you silly fool. Life goes on. The children will be here soon. Put a smile on your face."

As she began placing the books around the table, the doorbell rang. She looked at her watch; almost six o'clock. Everyone was here and she wasn't even ready.

"Just a minute," she called, running to the hall mirror. From the pocket of her apron, she took out a lipstick and, hands shaking, spread Pretty Pink across her lips. An old woman stared back at her. Smoothing her hair with her hands, she turned to open the door.

A crowd of people descended upon her. Voices collided as Sandra, Rhona, their husbands and children careened into her, exchanging hellos, hugs and kisses, enveloping her with their love. One by one they detached themselves from her and with sighs of "Ma, it smells so good in here, I'm starving," and "When do we start?" they filed into the apartment.

Coats scattered on the faded floral couches and just as Ruth turned the key in the lock, the doorbell rang again. She opened the door. A short round woman in a beige wool coat stood smiling at her. A red beret covered her hair.

Her thick arm was hooked tightly around the arm of a very old man. His hair was sparse and grey, his bushy Albert Einstein-like moustache a frosty white. His head hung down, his chin almost resting on the top of his coat. A middle-aged man with droopy eyes and a sad smile, who was almost as round and short as the woman, held onto the old man's other arm.

"Auntie Lottie, Cousin Marty, I'm so glad to see you," said Ruth, gesturing for them to come in. She reached gently for the old man.

"Thank you so much for picking Henry up from the nursing home for me." She bent to kiss her husband's grizzled cheek and took his hand, the skin dry like parchment.

"Hello my sweet Hershel. Good yontef. See, the children are all here for the first night of Passover."

Henry lifted his head. His once beautiful, intelligent eyes focused on her face. Still a sharp, vibrant blue, but now robbed of knowledge and memory, they reflected a vast chasm of loss.

Ruth pinned a navy blue linen yarmulke onto a wisp of Henry's hair and gently pulled his hand to guide him into the room. As he crossed the threshold, his toe caught on the moulding and he stumbled. The noise in the room stopped. Heads turned.

And then Sarah, 6, shouted "Zayde, ma nishtanah halaylah hazeh mikol halleylot?"

ENTEBBE: LET OUR PEOPLE LIVE

Like the wings of an eagle in flight,
The daring Israelis swooped down from the night,
plummeted,
and plucked our people,
swiftly, silently and safely,
from the tombs of their enforced plight.

Determined Israelis against indeterminable odds, against inexplicable hatred by invidious
many,

The skies opened wide, as did the Red Sea,
two thousand years ago,
cradling our people in the fluffballs of the clouds,
softly, swiftly and sorely,
"Wings of Mercy" flying,
safely thro' the night,
guided by the Star of David,
the brightest of light,

And for a brief moment in time,
the world stood still,
in awe,
and wonder,
and respect, for the brave few,
by the many,
in thankfulness,
in joy,
and in prayer,
for all mankind.

And in a brief moment in time,
while the rest of the world,
waited, debated and dictated,
Israel, straightened her weary back, to the pain of Auschwitz, Treblinka, Lod and Ma'alot,
and many other atrocities,

We stood tall and proud and right,
and while the rest of the world,
waited, debated and dictated,
we plucked our people,
swiftly, silently and safely,
and led them from the Tomb of darkness, to light.

A PAEAN TO FRIENDSHIP

Some people "float" into one's life – like the crest of a wind-swept wave, as it caresses the shore, leaving ripples in the "Sands of Time" – like the imprint of a special friendship which graces our life with purpose and sincerity,

Like the tapestry of cascading waves as they weave a fabric of patina-covered pebbles on a once pristine shore – like the indelible colours of a special friendship which embellish our life with care, kindness and consideration,

A friendship which we trust, will harbour us from the somewhat faulty insulation of the past and even, the present, in an increasingly atomized, de-personalized and de-humanized society – an experience, which we have all shared, at some time in our life,

May our friendship bring us together, in special prayer, with a promise for the future, our faith, our family and indeed, our community in a cornucopia of evergreen, where the garland of roses will always be in bloom.

A WONDERFUL DREAM

Mid of night…
Images from my youth
Vividly parade
Under my closed eyelids.

I see
Through two candle flames
My mother, praying…
Her head covered with lace
Light radiating from her face.
Her delicate appearance
Inspiring saintly respect.

Again I see
China plates
Speckled with gold
Ringing an immaculate linen cloth
Awaiting the blessing
Of food my mother served…
Fish, chicken soup,
Meat, kugel and more
We savoured all.
My father
At the head of the table

Solemnly blessing the wine,
The food,
His vigorous voice
Intoning songs,
Prayers, from ancient times.

The holidays!
The remembrance of bliss
And celebration
Rises above the deep regret
Of the passing
Of all I loved so well
Even in dreams
My heart's eye
Cannot let go my tears.

ARRIVAL IN THE HOLY LAND

When the virginal spring arrived
And the zephyrs caressed the buds
I came to thee my Holy land
With trembling lips of yearning.

The air was full of sweet scents
From vineyards and golden orchards
I was embraced by a dizzying spell
When I touched your ancient earth.

The sun penetrated my body
With warm, gentle affections
My cheeks were moistened by tears
I felt the joy of happiness.

O Land! Laden with milk and honey
Illuminated by beams of wisdom
How much I wanted in my dreams
To float above the great oceans.

To make to thee, humbly to kneel
To kiss your ground with passion
With the desire of five thousand years
My soul to be, enslaved and free.

HERE IS THE BREAD OF MISERY

It is an old story and an early story and a story we are told to retell of a telling that lies in the beginning, spores fathomed out of time to celebrate a mystery.
And so to you my children,
stranger from home, stranger to his flesh, stranger only beginning to be at home in his own strangeness,
I tell this story.
We are Hebrew,
and in a pasture transformed into sand once beat brick into royal tombs until a man with a staff and a tale roused promise from whiplashed memory.
So many sides to the story:
half-brothers fighting over diamonds,
a burning bush and a throne,
modes of production clashing,
modes of lamentation rising, strangers seeking permits from strangers to leave on equal terms, and the angel of death of little surety.
"A sea swallowed a people, another was set free."
A story older than I thought, and the Paris boulevards glitter cold;
better the bread of misery,
better the singing of bitter herbs and a drunken seer bearing kindness over portals.
My children, I would fain you be mindful, for the desert is wide and long and many a people have gone crazy looking for the whirlwind.
Be gentle therefore to the stranger,
and to the stranger in yourselves be kind,
and to the stranger beyond your gates offer food and drink, and to the stranger whom you love offer love,
and to those with names and to those without names offer comfort,
for this I wish to you:
candles and light, a full table,
pillows to lean on as you need them, strong memories all the days of your lives;
and as coda to this poem,
send my love to your mother.

THE PARTNERS RETIRE

That one grocery store could support two partners for thirty-five years
despite floods, spoilt fruit, hold-ups and inspectors was more amazing than they imagined

They worked without a fight and retired with the same old face.

No longer driven before lunch to deposit the cash, no longer concerned with rotating old stock,
they forgot each other until in a dream, with one woken eye on order from death,
they began to worry
whether the other had locked the door on the very last night.

Passover Greetings

The Making of a Dog Lover

By SORIN FINCHELSTEIN

Believe me, you will not find a more beautiful thing on this planet than spring in Minsk! Especially when you were born there, when your first attempted – and reciprocated – kiss happened in an unforgettable Minsk spring, when you got married in Minsk, right after Pesach, and, especially, when you hardly had a chance to see much of this planet but Minsk.

Just feel the warm southern wind gently playing with the newly born maple and oak leaves; breathe the unique sweet-and-sour aroma of the fully blossomed linden trees; let the sun's rays – elaborately sieved by the picturesque birch forest – reach your tired forehead; look at these tiny, ephemeral flies in their perennial wandering; listen to the divine harmony of the birds' song, and rejoice!

I am not a mind reader, yet there is a fair probability that these were the intimate thoughts Nathan Katzenberg was entertaining, while enjoying a Sunday hike on the outskirts of (guess!) Minsk, in a really gorgeous late May day, 1950-something…

For Nathan, a humble accountant in a humble office in humble downtown Minsk, this is the only bright spot in his cheerless, eventless, almost pointless life, a most dull Monday-to-Saturday routine; a routine that starts every morning at 7 a.m. sharp, with Nathan entering his dreary workplace.

Upon his arrival, our hero greets his sullen colleague listens to their morose answers, salutes his moody (on t hysterical side) supervisor, waits for a never-coming repl and, eventually, settles down behind his shabby desk.

Until four o'clock in the afternoon – save for t lunchtime hour – Nathan leafs through receipts, bill ledgers, accounts, reading some, throwing some in the rus garbage bin; punches in figures on the antique, painful noisy, mechanical calculating machine; writes sound, doc mented reports, which usually land – hardly looked at – his boss's trash basket; and, in between, stares aimlessly the grey wall whose cracked painting patterns – disappea ing upwards under the customary poster of Lenin, fro which the Father of the Revolution observes, rather apathe cally, the slow-moving operation of the Financial Office Minsk's Veterinary Authority — he has come to know heart.

In the evening, the mandatory, mostly fruitless tour of t vacant downtown stores, some long and equally futi lineups, and the boarding of the dilapidated, overcrowde terribly odorous, dangerously shaking, never-to-be-di posed-of, public bus, which has faithfully served Nathan neighbourhood over the last 15 years.

Lastly, Nathan is back home, inasmuch as one could c home a meagre attic-converted-to-flat flat which three fan lies are sharing. Nathan, his wife, and his two teenage so have been allotted two "bedrooms" facing the always ove flowing garbage bins in the backyard, the other two clos size rooms being occupied by a couple of couples: the fir in their late 20s, the second, in their early 80s.

The living room, the kitchen, and the makesh wash/shower room are jointly used by all of the abo tenants, and possessively patrolled by their two pets: an e ergetic, loudly barking puppy, belonging to the elder people, and an old, gloomy, lethargic, abundantly hair-she ding cat, owned – and inordinately spoiled – by the you pair.

Nathan's wife, embittered and hardened by the dai chores and the frequent fights with both her rebellious o spring and her much-too-close neighbours, turned into a d spicable shrew early in her marriage; as the years passed h she has drifted even further in that direction. As for Natha from the hobbies he used to enjoy during his distant yout such as violin playing, stamp collecting, and hiking, it only the latter which has endured and become his sole for of escape.

Every Sunday morning, Nathan boards the suburban tra hauled by a venerable, though surprisingly in working co dition, steam engine. Along with his travelling companions fishermen, hunters, painters and other odd kinds of people our accountant attempts to get a break from the city's smok noise, stress and soul-killing routine.

Getting off the train 45 minutes later, Nathan takes t gravelled path cutting through the birch forest, proceed under the viaduct carrying the railway, returns by the rive and finally, moves up the country road which brings hi back to the station. The entire circuit is about 20 kilometr long, and it takes our steady hiker around six hours to co plete, six hours during which he hardly meets another sou never mind a car, bus, truck or other manmade, self-pr pelled contrivance.

That is why today our outdoors-fond accountant is sligh ly surprised to hear the coughing of a car engine badly need of a tune-up, which approaches fast from behind, the dirt road under the viaduct. Afraid of being run over the middle of nowhere, Nathan takes cover behind t bushes. The car turns the bend down the road, a eventually comes into Nathan's sight. It is a frightfully ug Black Maria and stops (oy vay!) just 20 metres fro Nathan's hiding place. Under his startled eyes, the back do opens and a sizable sack is swiftly thrown to the ground. Im mediately, the car speeds away and quickly disappea

'There is something familiar in this haggard face' behind a cloud of ground mud, pulverized by its all-season worn tires.

Scared to death, Nathan needs quite a while to come to his senses, but finally manages to draw nearer to the object, which obviously has been deemed too heavy a burden for the fragile eight-seat station-wagon. To Nathan's astonishment, "the object" starts shaking and emitting strange noises. Eventually regaining his wits, after carefully taking stock of the surroundings, Nathan pulls out his penknife and carefully rips the coarse outer cloth. Inside it, tightly and artfully bound, there is a man. Or is that the ghost of a man? For the prisoner has evidently been beaten up and, judging from the cigarette marks on his hands and torso, methodically tortured.

Without much help from the paddy-wagon's castaway, Nathan drags him away from the road. Eventually, he has his protégé sitting on a felled log and drinking some leftover tea. While the escapee gluttonously swallows the last tea drips from Nathan's old, wartime canteen, still continuously trembling, his saviour stands by and watches attentively.

There is something familiar in this haggard face, in these convulsive movements! When and where did he meet this poor man? The hapless stranger definitely reminds him of somebody! Oh, mein Got, but this is Hersh, Hersh Blumenthal! They really did a helluva job on him!

Following this realization, Nathan tries to initiate some sort of contact. However, since he had formal training just as an accountant, his attempts at acting as a psychologist are highly empirical.

"Hersh, can you hear me? It's me, Nathan! Would you tell me, please, what happened to you?"

The man on the stump makes a swift attempt to get up, but this effort is hindered by his weakened legs. He shudders miserably, while desperately looking around for illusive help. Extremely impressed, and by now positive about the other's identity, Nathan decides to go on.

"Hersh, look at me, please! Can't you see? I'm Nathan, Nathan Katzenberg! Don't you remember me? We attended the same school, the Public School Joseph Vissarionovitch Stalin, may the earth spit him out! You even used to call me Natkatz! And the nickname stuck for all my school years."

The man loses his grip on the canteen, flinches as it bangs to the ground, looks up in terror, and eventually breaks into a hardly coherent babbling.

"I was well treated...! I know no more than I stated in the declaration I signed...! I respectfully ask to be taken back to my cell!"

"Listen, Hersh, you have to remember me! We once fell in love with the same girl, Liuba, the one with long, braided, sandy-blonde hair and wonderful, deep-blue eyes. She used to live right across the street from the old bathhouse."

"I was well treated...! I know no more than I stated in the declaration I signed...! I respectfully ask to be taken back to my cell!"

'All things considered ...they weren't that bad'

"How about the army, Hersh? We fought the Germans together, almost three years in the same platoon. Moscow, Stalingrad, Kursk... 'Death to the fascist invaders!' 'Towards Berlin, in high gear!' 'Long live our glorious Red Army!'"

"I was well treated...! I know no more than I stated in the declaration I signed...! I respectfully ask to be taken back to my cell!"

"Hersh, Hershale, please try speaking to me! It's all over! There is no reason for you to be frightened anymore! You are free now! I am Nathan, your old friend! You have to remember me! We both fell prisoners to the Germans. Don't you have any recollection of the camp? The decrepit shacks swept over by the gusty, harsh wind, the searching lights blinding us in our tormented sleep, the always busy gallows creaking lugubriously under their unfortunate load; and then, the dogs, the savage German Shepherds trained to attack, jumping on us, tearing at our tattered clothes, at our parched flesh, at our skeletal limbs, the dogs that were just about to catch us in every nightmare we had. Those beastly dogs, barking and barking, forever?"

Finally, there is a slight, almost imperceptible change in the bearing of the battered man. Could it be the start of his coming back to his senses? The deepening of wrinkles on his forehead reveals an excruciating effort to penetrate his blurred memory. His terrified eyes are frantically struggling to focus. And, eventually, his will winning over his prostration, he speaks barely audibly, in a still quivering voice, his head nodding endlessly, beyond any control.

"The dogs..., yes..., the ever barking dogs...! Of course. I do remember those beastly dogs! Though..., all things considered..., they weren't that bad...!"

SACRIFICE

And he took in his hand the fire and the consuming knife, and they walked together – Genesis 22:6

Yes, I can see how with God's voice echoing in your ears you could pick up the fire in your hand and not flinch not even feel the searing heat burning your flesh
After all, what is flesh
when your business is with God?

Maybe, even the pain was a welcome reminder that we all go down to numb silence and dust that our souls bear their bodies as souvenirs of this world
Yours tethered you as you flew like a kite seeking its prey

But your boy
Didn't he shout no
try to grab your hand look for water or sand to douse that awful undying flame eating your hand
your knife would soon eat his throat although he didn't know that and walked along beside you no god-voice burning inside his head trusting

And maybe your child forgot and reaching to take your hand singed himself on your red-hot zeal and, crying out in his pain, reminded you of yours
wrenched your eyes from the mountaintop at the horizon to his poor blistered hand and you soothed it with oil and thought Well, I must be more careful now with him, he has been too dear to us to overlook him now

And thinking us, you thought too of her sitting by the hearth and listening for dim rumours at dusk among the tents of where you had gone with him she keeping the oil-lamps lit and filling the tent with the smell of bread teaching the other women how to tame the god-fire and share it a defence against the cold desert night the furious and indifferent blaze of stars

And you thought of the nights you each warmed against the other and how her heat had comforted you in your despair and you thought
how ordinary that was among husbands and wives that softness in the midst of boulders and thorny scrub and wished maybe that you had been content with that never heard God nor demanded miracles and not been about to purchase prophecy with your son's blood

Or maybe that wasn't a price you had to pay your future for the ever-deepening now because nothing fuels the god-fire it burns nothing
it singes nothing and you and the boy were all right not consumed and your hand was fine when you picked up the fire the flame rested in your palm like a fluttering bird and you and the boy sang
as you walked toward that distant height together enjoying the fine day

And he didn't wonder about the fire at all because, really, the world was filled with miracles and there would be another one along at any moment and so he wasn't worried about the ropes and the wood and the knife and the loneliness and the rocky trail you climbed together and calmly he lay on the altar and let you, weeping, tie him down and raise the knife and he looked past you into god and was blindly happy to think that his future might end here or go on and that death and life were equally astonishing so whichever way the blade fell he would be grateful.

MOMMY, WHY DID YOU LEAVE ME?

I was only four years old when I saw you last
But your kind and lovely face
Is still in front of my eyes.
You said many times how much you loved me
Then why? Why did you leave me?

We had many lovely times together
You took me in the park to play
You read my favourite books to me every day
And you said that you always,
Always wanted me close to you.
You held me tight and kissed me
Then why? Why did you leave me?

It's been three years already
I'm a big girl by now, over seven
But every night when I close my eyes
And before I go to sleep, I still think of you Mommy
Why? Why did you leave me?

I'm in a children's home now
With many other orphaned children
And I have friends and nannies I like.
But one day I was told that evil men had killed you
Because there was a war.
But what did you do? What was your sin Mommy?
Why? Why did you have to leave me?

You should have told those evil men
That you had a little girl at home,
You should have told those bad people
To leave you alone.
If you loved me and you had told them about me...
Then why? Why did you have to leave me?

I believed you when you said you loved me.
I loved you too, I still do.
But I wish somebody would tell me
Why? Oh why did you have to leave me?

Matzah Blues

By RONALD RUSKIN

In 1954, I was the only Jew in my public school in Toronto.

We lived over my father's drugstore in the west end. There were farms, a few stores, churches and lots of goyim. You could not see a Jew for miles.

"Bubba? How come we don't believe in Good Friday?"

"Good Friday is for goyim."

"Why can't I have a Easter egg? A bunny maybe?"

"No eggs. No bunny. They are chametz, Reuben."

"Can I have bubble gum? Chips?"

"No bubble gum. No chips. They are chametz too."

"Bubba, why is everything that tastes good chametz?"

"Freg mir nisht. Eat an egg."

My schoolmates had bubble gum, chips and hotlips. They munched chocolate Easter eggs at recess. The goyim developed a white bread without seeds that came in a coloured balloon package. Wonder bread it was called – perfect for sandwiches.

"Bubba, if goyim have Wonder bread, what do Jews have?"

"Matzah is what Jews have. Genug shein."

* * *

Bubba made sandwiches – two pieces of matzah with lettuce and gefilte fish and chrain to hold everything together. She wrapped the sandwich in wax paper, put napkins around it and tied it with elastic bands. In a bag she threw dills, boiled eggs. When I took the sandwiches to school and removed the elastic bands, crowds of goyim watched.

"What's that?" they asked.

Carefully I undid the waxed paper. "Matzah sandwiches."

Once I reached the chrain I cried. My nose ran.

"Poor Reuben," the kids said. "No wonder he's depressed."

"My bubba made the chrain," I said. "Try it. Go ahead."

The goyim had never seen matzah sandwiches. One hero took a look, had a bite, turned red, then choked. We dragged him to the bathroom and poured water into his mouth.

Fortunately for the Jews, he survived.

For six months from Passover until Rosh Hashanah, my bubba ate matzah. She ate it for breakfast. She ate it as a snack at night. Plain. I figured for health reasons, or she was guilty for sins. Perhaps it was a secret ritual.

Who in their right mind ate matzah after Pesach?

In those days, you went back to Egypt to celebrate Pesach. My family had no hired help. I was their slave.

With Bubba and my mother, I put chametz into boxes. They gave me a shmatte to wash shelves. I lugged Pesachdicke shissels and teppels from the drugstore basement.

Bubba spread newspaper over the kitchen. My job was silverware: cutlery, candlesticks, cups, serving spoons.

"Tateleh, I want you should see your face in each spoon."

"And forks and big knives?" I asked.

"Keep them from your ponim. You'll lose eigelach."

Each year, tarnish grew on silver. When I rubbed it with polish, my fingers turned coal-black. Afterwards everything sparkled. Cutlery, silver cups, candlesticks, all gleamed like jewels.

"Reuben. Wash. Take that shmoot off. I can't have you touch clean fis with poison on your fingers."

Bubba was a scary boss in th kitchen. She warned about goring, pierc ing eyes, slicing fingers, igniting schmaltz fire and burning down th drugstore.

I figured why she ate matzah half th year. It was like gum. To calm he nerves.

* * *

My earliest Pesach memory was carp swimming in a tank. Bubb shlepped me to Cohen's Fish store a College and Clinton. I could look at th carp for hours.

"Which one should we get, Reuben?

"Him." I pointed. "Der gross schwartze."

Cohen pulled the carp out, knucke his kop, wrapped him in paper. We too the carp home on the streetcar.

Whitefish. Carp. Pickerel. Sometime a piece of salmon, went into gefilte fis I had sharp eyes and quick fingers, an I worked the mashinka.

"Watch fingerlach don't get chuppe inside. Careful."

A mashinka was a heavy meta mincer you hooked to the table. Poo Jewish families had them.

You had to be a soldier to mak gefilte fish. Inside the mashinka was metal screw. The fish and onions wer areingeshtupped into the mashinka wit one hand, but not too hard, while yo turned the screw handle with your othe hand.

"Turn."

"I can't see. Onions. I'm blind."

'I hucked in time to radio music'

"Reuben. Don't panic."

"I can't breathe. I can't see."

"Get used to it." Bubba said.

Bubba said to keep your eyes open with onions. Never talk when you work the mashinka or the ribeisen in case you got distracted and lost fingerlach.

On the other side of the mashinka was a wooden chopping bowl. I worked fish and onions with a huckmesser; Bubba threw in eggs, matzah meal, salt, sugar, pepper.

With the ribeisen I grated carrots.

People collapsed making gefilte fish. If you didn't catch fingers in the mashinka, you went blind or you left skin on the ribeisen. And you could maim your entire body with the huckmesser, a weapon from the Crusades, a huge blade that curved on your hand like on brass knuckles.

Bubba sat me a stool with the wooden bowl on my thighs. I hucked in time to radio music.

"Reuben. Stop with the music. You'll huck your polkes off."

After the gefilte fish, I tzeklapped eggs. I plucked feathers from dead chickens. I cut onions for chicken soup. I washed the mashinka. I took it apart – the screw, the metal plate at the end with the locknut and rinsed it. We used the mashinka for chickenballs and chopped liver.

Bubba fried chicken fat for griebenes. Bottles of schmaltz she made for frying: eggs, onions, matzah-brei.

In those days, people threw schmaltz into everything.

My mother cooked, but she worked in the drugstore. Aunt Leah lived with Uncle Ellis and Bubba in the clothing store down the street. Together they made tzimmes, knaidlach, kishke, flumen, bobelach, potatonik.

I was apprenticed to the women in the kitchen, while downstairs my father served customers, counted pills and filled prescriptions in the dispensary. Upstairs, I chopped, sliced, washed and bled to death in the kitchen.

In school I learned English.

But I was a Jewish boychik who could not read Hebrew.

* * *

Bubba asked. "Reuben, du kenst fregen di fir kashas?

"A tateh must teach his zin."

After supper we had civil war. Walls shook. Bubba yelled. Who led us to farmers' fields? Why hadn't we stayed in Toronto? Who surrounded us with goyim? She pointed out the window. "Gib a kik. A shul, a cheder?" Bubba went berserk.

"Don't push me," Father warned. Mother went pale.

"Reuben will turn into a vilde chaye." Bubba shrieked.

That did it. My father crashed a plate to the floor. Didn't they understand? He had moved for business. A Jew had to make a living! One day we would return to live with other Jews in a house with a car and a garden.

I bent to pick up the pieces but my mother sent me to bed.

That night I had a terrifying dream.

I stood before my aunts and uncles. A Haggadah was put in my hands. What side was up? I turned it around. There were no pictures. When it was up, it was Hebrew. When it was down, it was Yiddish.

'How small was my universe as a child

Sideways, it was Chinese. Who knew? My father's brother, Uncle Morris, a radiologist, came over. Morris had white hair like Einstein.

"Reuben. The fir kashas."

I opened my mouth.

Nothing.

The dreaded evening of the first seder approached.

The living-room chandelier radiated a golden glow. The white tablecloth sparkled with silverware and crystal. I stared with terror at destiny – the seder table and Haggadot.

My father practised the questions with me, in Yiddish, then Hebrew, then English. I was hopeless.

The strange words did not stay in my head.

How small was my universe as a child! Heaven contained the mysteries of existence. I could hardly read English. Why had we moved? Where was home?

Bubba told me a sad story. My father smoked and worked on Shabbes. He did not get along with Zayde Note.

Once my father had been a vilde chaye too.

"Bubba? Tell me more."

In Yiddish she whispered. I did not understand.

"Bubba. Why do you eat matzah after Pesach?"

Bubba shrugged.

* * *

Zayde Note, my father's father had yellow beard and beady dark eyes. Zayde at the head of the seder table, propped by pillow, wearing a pillbox yarmulke, a rab from Riga who knew Torah backwards. make money, he worked as a shoichet. Ever body was scared of him.

"Reuben." Zayde Note said. "A kiss."

His bristly beard scoured my cheek. H smiled. For the next half-hour I lived in terr My eyes bulged behind a Haggadah. The kashas flew through my skull like birds could never catch them. Finally, cousin Dav stood and sang them. Afterwards, to cal down, I drank four glasses of wine.

The evening passed as a dream. Fac floated in golden twilight, my father besi his father, Bubba, Aunt Leah, carrying steam ing food, my mother flushed, her stoma stretched with Daniel, my brother, waiting get out.

Years later, many of them have passed in blessed memory.

The chairs around the seder shift. A tab is set; Pesach returns; our faces age.

We move in life's order, taking the pla of others.

In the centre of the seder lies the matz that I ate as a child. And beside it all the tast of life.

Sweet. Bitter. Sour. Salt.

My mouth is a memory of fond childhoo

JERUSALEM DREAMING

Oh, Jerusalem!
Though I have never laid my naked eyes upon you,
I have heard about your splendour, and see it in the photographs
through eyes of my Jew essence, the lender of sight and insight.
Anti-matter to the anti-Semite.

Oh, Jerusalem!
The sun dropped a smile upon your face and left it there.
The moon brought to you on a gilded platter a confetti of stars in moon-glow jars
for the sky to splatter, as evidence your beauty was birthed in holiness.

Oh, Jerusalem!
Even the sound of your name
is enchantment.
Like a lullaby, it swims upon the tongue and makes the sayer thirst among its syllables.
Even the sound of your name
they envied,
as cities, ghettos, gas chambers they emptied.

Auschwitz, Bergen-Belsen, Birkenau, Gunskirchen.
Black letters in a row, rows side by side.
In darkness and in light.
The manifestation of a madman's lust for his evil inclination.
Oh, Jerusalem!
I am a grandchild of the Holocaust.
My mother, my protector,
who never spoke of the camps.
Who left it up to me to find out about the ovens and the experiments.
Who dreamt of you, Jerusalem,
Sweet dreams that kept her alive,
Whispering: for my sake, you shall survive.
And thanks to you, now I, too, am here.
Here, somewhere,
though in fact nowhere.
For the only here and the only where is you, Jerusalem.

Oh, Jerusalem!
Beauty and holiness and truth.
The poultice for every wound on every Jew through three thousand years, inflicted in anticipation and arrears.

You are the hope forever sweet.
Next year, Jerusalem.
Next year, B'ezrat Hashem. We meet.

THE KINNERET

At summer's edge,
By the sands of the Kinneret,
I found a stream of sun-lit rock
And saw myself becoming history
With her movements, richly playing
Like a harp to a fine cup of pebbles
Travelling the lines of my hands.
Crystal-clear under water, I ran
The fine stones through my fingers,
As another atom of loosened grain
Sparked to each new pull of strand.
Watching this evolution surface,
I touched the soft erosion of the waves
Breathing the morning sands.
Back and forth, the shore hugged me
Like the cradle of a well-worn love
Until quieted, one spark,
Shimmering, stayed
Just as the Kinneret kissed my arm.

A Passover Dream

By JUDITH UNGAR WEINRYB

Waiting for her doctor's appointment on the ninth floor of the Toronto Hospital, Francine felt herself dozing off as one hour turned into two. Of all days to get a cancellation with the dermatologist – erev Pesach, and on a Friday no less!

When she was finally done, Francine was able to escape the long maze of halls leading to the University Avenue doors of the hospital, and she breathed a tremendous sigh of relief at being outdoors.

After spending three hours in the building, she felt a sense of liberation and found pleasure in the early spring breeze as she began to walk down University Avenue towards Elm Street. At first, she walked at a brisk pace, but then she stopped for a moment to take a long, hard look at the Mount Sinai Hospital across the street. Joshua and Ilana had been born there not much more than a decade ago. It seemed, thought Francine, just like yesterday.

'Perhaps someone is filming a TV show'

Glancing around her, she could see only more hospitals and office buildings, an endless flow of concrete and glass divided by the road that ran between them.

It was almost noon. Francine picked up her pace and headed towards her car, which was parked near her husband's office on Dundas Street. As she walked along Elizabeth Street towards her destination, Francine noticed a sign for Hayter Street, a street that appeared to be so short and nondescript that she was surprised someone had actually bothered to name it.

"It's so bleak and lifeless," she thought to herself, "just the backs of tall buildings and not a sign of life, not even a pigeon or a stray seagull in sight."

Francine was looking down at her watch to check the time when she was startled to hear a voice call out, as if from nowhere, "Lady, watch out!"

By the time she realized that she was in danger of being hit by a passing car, she had jumped onto the curb and fallen to the pavement.

"Madam, are you all right?" were the next words Francine heard, as she lay staring up at the clear blue April sky.

A small, dainty arm reached down and touched her brow, as a sweet looking young face appeared before her eyes.

"You must move from here at once or you'll be trampled for sure," the youngster cried in a soft but insistent tone.

"Trampled, by what? A team of horses?" laughed Francine, wondering if the girl was having fun pulling her leg.

As she lifted her head to look around, she was amazed to see what appeared to be an old-fashioned delivery wagon pulled by two grey horses, moving slowly along the road.

"How odd" she thought. "There must be an explanation, perhaps someone is filming a TV show or a film?"

The girl seemed just as out of place as the wagon, dressed as she was in a long, navy blue smock with ruffles at the bottom, a light cotton cape draped over her shoulders. She seemed to be no more than 12, but did not seem at all child-like in her manner.

Where was she? Was this a dream? A hallucination, perhaps?

She looked down and noticed that the pavement had disappeared; in its place was a dusty road. A simple cottage with a thatched roof and a chimney sticking up through it stood across the path. There were planks leading to what appeared to be a doorway surrounded by a variety of colourful weeds.

"Come," the girl begged in a warm, caring voice. "You have had quite a fall and need to rest. I am sure that Mama will be pleased to make you a cup of tea. She will be home soon after she returns from meeting Papa at the train from Halifax. We are all so happy that he has finally come!

"Oh, by the way," she said, "I am Sarah Granatstein from Minsk and I am pleased to make your acquaintance."

Francine was confused but enthralled by the situation in which she found herself. She could see all around her simple cottages like the one where Sarah lived with her family.

A disheveled-looking peddler was sharpening knives just down the road, surrounded by a curious group of children. The children were dressed quite shabbily, and most had no shoes on their feet. Nearby, three ladies, wearing long cotton dresses and shawls on their heads, were having an animated conversation.

'Is this why I came to Canada?'

"The Rebbe is coming," she heard one say. "He is arriving today at Union Station and Malka has gone to meet him."

A mother pushing a wooden baby carriage strolled past a cottage that served as a butcher shop as well. A drawing of a chicken hung at the entrance with the words "Kosher Butcher" carved into the wood.

Farther down the street, ladies were leaning over crates of fruit and vegetables lined up on the porch of another cottage. A man appeared to be in charge, as his customers selected produce to be used, most likely, for the seder that evening.

"Mr. Myerovitz," she heard someone say, "can I pay you next week after Mendel gets back from selling fish at the St. Lawrence Market?"

A kind voice answered, "I can't say no to you, Blima my dear, but if no one pays me today, how will my wife Faygl be able to buy matzah for the seder?"

In spite of their apparent hardship, the two laughed heartily as they wished each other a "gut yontif."

"What a wonderful dream," thought Francine, "When will I awaken?"

As she held Sarah's arm and walked into the house, she saw that it was just a room with a dirt floor. In the centre stood a wooden stove, and nearby was a large metal basin. There were two beds in one corner; in another was a small table, covered with a lovely lace tablecloth and elegant, gold-rimmed china plates. The table shone in contrast to the shabbiness around it.

'In the year 1915'

"These belonged to my grandparents in Minsk," Said Sarah. "They are all that we have from home. Papa buried them so the Cossacks could not find them. It is truly a miracle that they did not break on our journey to Canada. Now, we use them only for Pesach."

"Pesach, did she say Pesach?" thought Francine, remembering that she was in a hurry to get home to prepare for the holiday.

"Please Sara, I must go now," she said, still not realizing that this was no longer the Toronto she knew, but a smaller, simpler community in the year 1915.

At that moment, the door opened and a short, bearded man stepped into the cottage. He looked weary, having just arrived from his journey across the ocean. He walked towards Sarah, clutching the hands of his two younger children, whom he had not seen for a long time, and looked as though he might collapse from exhaustion.

"Papa" cried Sarah, as she looked up at her father's face. "You have arrived, Baruch HaShem," she said, tears flowing down her face. "Where is Mama? Did she take a chicken to the shochet to slaughter for the seder tonight?

"Oh, Papa," she added, "I don't mind if we just eat potatoes, as long as you are here with us!"

Reb Moshe looked at Sarah and then turned towards the two smaller children standing next to him, barefoot and wearing rags.

"Is this why I came to Canada?" he shouted, "to see my children go without shoes and hope that there will be food for today and maybe for tomorrow? Is this freedom? Who needs this freedom if we must suffer here as we did in Russia?" he cried, before falling helplessly onto a small wooden chair.

Then, looking at Francine, a stranger in this strange new place, Reb Moshe asked, with a look of sadness and confusion in his eyes, "Why do my children have no shoes?"

"Reb Moshe," said Francine, uncertain herself about where she was, but speaking with deep conviction, "Do not despair. You will see that your children will soon have shoes and that there will be food on your table."

As Reb Moshe tried to muster a faint smile of gratitude for her kind words, Francine felt a warm hand on her shoulder and turned to see her husband Sam calling her name.

"Are you all right?" he asked, in a concerned tone of voice. "You've been asleep all afternoon and I was so worried about you."

As he held her in his arms, Francine wondered what had been real and what had been a dream. In spite of this uncertainty, she felt a renewed sense of hope, knowing that, in that brief moment of her life, she had welcomed Reb Moshe to Canada.

Passover Greetings

The enclosed poem was written by me in London, Dec. 20, 1942, the city I fled to with the Kindertransport from Nuremberg, Bavaria, Germany.

I sent the poem to my brother Joseph Faust in Canada. A few weeks ago he brought me the original version, all yellow from age. When I wrote the poem, my parents had already perished in the concentration camp in Riga.

Sincerely,
Hanna Tennenhaus

P.S. I left for London May 16, 1939, when I was 18.

TO MY PARENTS' SILVER WEDDING
(Dec. 20th 1942)

I close my eyes
So that within my mind
Your images become so vivid and so clear
Till suddenly I realize
It's only pain which I thus find
And with a sigh, I shed a bitter tear.

My thoughts are travelling many miles,
Across unhappy, conquered land
Not even knowing where to halt
To be with you, my so beloved ones, exiles
And victims of a ruthless, brutal hand
Enduring hardships unequalled.

You wanted us three children to be safe
And tried with all your strength,
To get us where we would be unperturbed again
Out of that so much hated Nazi cave;
When of yourselves you thought at length
It was too late, so you had to remain.

Your silver wedding is approaching swiftly
It was to have been a memorable event,
So full of joy and happiness.
But now I can but whisper sadly:
Oh God, bring all this to an end
And help all those innocently in distress,

by Hanna Tennenhaus

What is Jewish Toronto Tomorrow?

When individuals plan for the future they come up with ideas. When an entire community is inspired to dream about the future a shared vision emerges. That vision is Jewish Toronto Tomorrow.

When UJA FEDERATION launched Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) on April 16, it also inaugurated a new era of community planning and development. This groundbreaking initiative will significantly alter the physical landscape of our community and change the way our community cares for its needs from now on.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow represents the largest development program in our community's history, focusing on three campuses — downtown, the Bathurst-Sheppard corridor and York Region, Canada's third largest Jewish community.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is also a new way of creating community partnerships to meet current, emerging and future needs. "It's about creating strong links between agencies and donors through innovative, cooperative efforts," explains UJA FEDERATION President Alan Sandler. "It's being proactive instead of reactive in dealing with our community's expansion."

In the past, many community agencies have looked to UJA FEDERATION to provide funding through the annual campaign and endowments. Yet available UJA FEDERATION resources, derived from the traditional fundraising and allocation process, cannot always satisfy funding needs in the wake of dramatic government spending cuts and the community's rapid growth.

Under Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, UJA FEDERATION will go beyond its traditional scope of fundraising, which includes the annual campaign, endowments and capital contributions, to seek out philanthropists whose own personal interests can be matched with specific community projects undertaken by schools and agencies. These partnerships will not only open doors for innovative solutions to community challenges, they will also provide new avenues for individuals to become involved in all levels of community building.

"The annual campaign supports core community services and will remain a central component of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow," asserts Ed Sonshine, who is chairing UJA FEDERATION Campaign 2001 with Ron Frisch. "One of the biggest advantages of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's broad scope is to open new avenues for community members to support the annual campaign," adds Frisch.

"Jewish Toronto Tomorrow represents a whole new way of doing business and a new era in Jewish philanthropy," explains Leslie Gales, co-Chair, with Barry Sherman, of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Steering Committee.

The dramatic growth of Toronto's Jewish population, now exceeding 180,000, says Gales, is a tribute to the high quality of life our community offers. "It's no wonder nearly one out of every two Canadian Jews lives in the Greater Toronto Area and that second and third generations are choosing to remain in the community in which they were raised."

But, along with growth, come challenges. "Community agencies and organizations are struggling to secure the resources they need to meet rising demands for programs and services," explains Barry Sherman, one of JTT's founders. "These challenges are so critical to the future well-being of our community that they require a fundamental change in approach — a distinct departure from traditional tactics. We have an unprecedented opportunity through Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, not to mention an obligation to our children, to act now."

"JTT is about going beyond simply maintaining what we have," adds Gales. "It's about building a community that until now, people have only dared to dream of."

Initial Agenda: Jewish Toronto Tomorrow represents an ambitious coordinated effort to increase Annual UJA Federation Campaign contributions, develop a huge reserve of endowment funds for future generations and expand our capital infrastructure to meet the needs of a growing and thriving Jewish community. Here's a brief outline of JTT projects that are envisioned for phase one of this initiative:

THE ANNUAL UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN:
Meeting The Challenges Of A Caring Jewish Community Today

An integral part of the vision for Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, the Annual UJA Federation Campaign will grow to $50 million and beyond in yearly giving in order to meet the needs of our dynamic Jewish community, both at home and abroad. The Annual Campaign — the life blood of our institutions — will continue to deliver vital services that assist the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity and rescue Jews in danger.

ENDOWMENT FUNDS:
Our Gift For Future Generations

Endowment funds will become growing sources of strategic communal philanthropy and assist in expanding our community's ability to build and shape its future. Their growth, so essential to sustaining the vitality of this great Jewish community, will ensure a legacy of caring and inspiration for our children, here and around the world. Under the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow tent, vast amounts of new funds will be invested and built up for future generations to come.

CO-ORDINATED CAPITAL CAMPAIGNS:
Building Centres For Jewish Life Throughout Our Community

- Downtown Campus: Nadal Jewish Community Centre — Bloor & Spadina, Green Family Cultural Centre — Bloor & Spadina, Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life — Harbord & Huron.
- Central Campus: Bathurst Jewish Centre/Lipa Green Complex, Koffler Centre for the Arts, Leah Posluns Theatre, My Jewish Discovery Place Children's Museum, Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, Limud: The Centre for Jewish Learning, The Dr. Abraham Shore Academy She'arim Hebrew Day School, and CHAT — The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre.
- York Region Campus: Jewish Community Family Centre, Jewish Day Schools, Assisted Housing, Elder Care Services, Summer Day Camp, Outdoor Education Facility, Cultural Centre, Amphitheatre.

OTHER SPECIAL PROJECTS:
Coordinated through Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (additional projects pending)

Ashkenaz, Birthright Israel, Camp George, Camp Ramah, Reena, Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa, Jewish Russian Community Centre, Zareinu.

The journey to Jewish Toronto Tomorrow began downtown and was fueled by the ongoing generosity of the Jewish community.

Milestones along the way

AS WITH ALL modern North American Jewish communities, the history of Jewish Toronto is marked by incremental changes as well as monumental movements forward. The milestones along the way are the measure of a mature community — one that has collectively mastered the mechanisms necessary to respond to growing needs. Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is the latest expression of the determination and ability of Toronto's Jewish community to marshal all of its collective resources toward a common purpose — meeting future needs.

From the early explosion of Jewish social welfare agencies, schools and synagogues during the turn of the 20th century to the carefully planned construction of large centralized institutions over the last 50 years, Jewish Toronto has pursued a steady pace of progress.

When a growing number of European immigrants swelled an already struggling community during the first decades of the 1900s, the first centralized community fundraising campaign began to evolve. The United Jewish Welfare Fund, UJA FEDERATION's predecessor, helped agencies to meet growing demands for assistance and decreased competition for scarce funds.

The historic Kiever Synagogue, above, was the site of the JTT launch on April 16, 2000.

Like previous milestones that have shaped the unique character of our thriving community, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow symbolizes the fulfillment of a new shared vision

Breaking ground for the Lipa Green Building in the early '80s.

As World War II ended and the impact of the Holocaust sank in, Toronto Jewry helped to finance the establishment of a Jewish state. And Jewish Toronto has been internationally recognized ever since for strongly supporting Israel during war and peace.

By the 1950s, a highly organized community began to build more structures to provide the local Jewish population with the necessary infrastructure to grow and thrive. In 1952, the Bloor Jewish Community Centre opened its doors and quickly became a magnet for Jews seeking a connection to their community.

The community's expansion northward during the '50s and '60s increased demand for Jewish services and infrastructure, as families began to settle in the city's northern residential areas along the Bathurst Street corridor. This stage of development was marked by the construction of a northern branch of the JCC, a Jewish centre for the arts, Baycrest, as well as several schools and synagogues.

Now Toronto's Jewish community is once again experiencing such explosive growth. In York Region alone, the Jewish population is expected to reach over 75,000 in the next ten years. But growth is not confined to York Region. Toronto is the only North American Jewish community exhibiting a rise in Jewish urban migration. Over 25,000 Jews, living and working in the city centre, are contributing to a revival of downtown Jewish life.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow represents a new phase of development. Like previous milestones that have shaped the unique character of our thriving community, Jewish Toronto Tomorrow symbolizes the fulfillment of a shared vision — a new plan of action to meet future needs.

Jewish TORONTO tomorrow

Blueprints for success

A key component of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow represents the largest infrastructure program in our community's history. It will focus on three campuses for Jewish life — downtown, the Bathurst-Sheppard corridor and York Region, Canada's third largest Jewish community. Here is how this initiative is dramatically improving existing facilities and developing new ones Jewish families are returning to this downtown district — once the heart of Jewish Toronto.

The Downtown Campus

Once the heart of Jewish Toronto, the downtown core continues to be a vital focus of Jewish communal life. Today, more than 25,000 Jews live and work in the downtown area, in addition to thousands of Jews who travel south regularly for everything from schooling to culture.

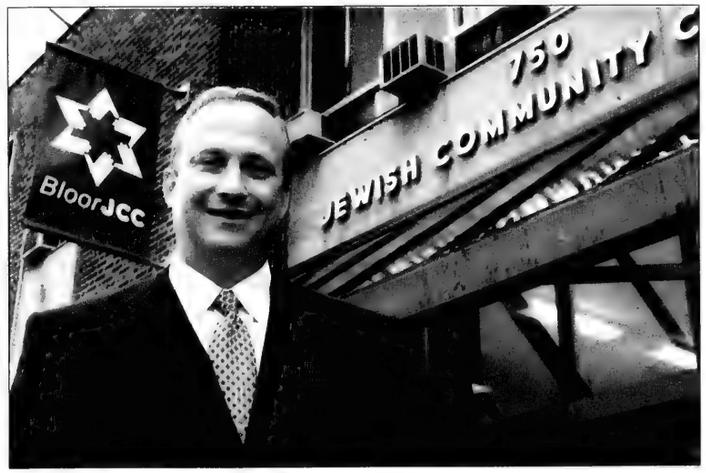
The sustenance of Jewish life in the city centre is an important component of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow. After all, it's where Jewish Toronto began. Aside from its nostalgic appeal, the distinct downtown community has become a magnet for newcomers attracted to its cosmopolitan character and diversity. In fact, Toronto is one of the only downtowns in North America with a steadily increasing Jewish population, paying tribute to Toronto's quality of life, which Jewish Toronto Tomorrow will nurture and preserve.

Thriving on its own unique brand of urban Jewish living and an increasingly diverse population, the downtown Jewish community remains deeply rooted in its historical surroundings — most notably the landmark Bloor Jewish Community Centre, now over 50 years old. The Bloor JCC will be the centrepiece of the new Nadal Jewish Community Centre, to be built through the generosity of Miles Nadal, which will include the Green Family Cultural Centre, a project of Al Green, David Y. Green and their families.

Situated at the bustling southwest corner of Spadina and Bloor, the Bloor JCC is literally bursting at the seams from dawn till dusk. Every square inch of space is in constant use by a growing number of members, as well as neighbourhood groups engaged in a wide range of activities. In addition to serving as headquarters for the 23 member Downtown Jewish Community Council, the Bloor building also houses a Jewish day school, a supplementary school, a day care centre, a nursery and a branch of Jewish Family & Child Service.

A major infrastructure revitalization project, which will maintain the heritage and tradition of Toronto's original Jewish community, is slated to begin next fall. It will include physical expansion, storefront commercial space, new health and fitness facilities, modern sports and recreation equipment and a state-of-the-art theatre. The creation of a new modern Jewish community centre, made possible through a partnership between UJA FEDERATION, the Bloor JCC and key community donors, will ensure that dramatically increased demand for programs and services can be met well into the future.

Breathing new life into a community icon is just one exciting element of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's vision for the future. Another important initiative is the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at Harbord and Huron to serve University of Toronto students who currently lack a location for Jewish programs and activities.



A capital contribution from Miles Nadal, above, will help finance the renewal of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

Near left: JTT helped to build the new Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre at CHAT.

Centre: The Bathurst Jewish Centre is an important part of JTT's central campus.

The Central Campus

As more and more Jews began to settle in neighbourhoods scattered north along the Bathurst Street corridor during the 1950s, an extensive network of Jewish communal buildings and services emerged to meet the needs of a growing community. Synagogues, schools and Jewish organizations were located close to Jewish residents and each other, creating a tightly woven community fabric.

In 1960, the building of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), nestled in the rugged ravine north of Sheppard Avenue, created a focal point for community development, eventually growing to symbolize the vitality and vibrancy of modern Jewish Toronto. Today, the BJC and the adjacent Lipa Green Building, which houses key communal agencies, including UJA FEDERATION, continue to be the hub of Jewish activity serving the city's highest concentration of Jews.

"We want to turn the BJC into a place where people will come and stay," says BJC President Bruce Leboff. "Our goal for the future is to improve our infrastructure and further integrate our programs, services and facilities to create an even more vital hub of Jewish activity at the BJC," adds Helen Finder Guttman, a member of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's Central Campus Steering Committee.

Key Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Central Campus projects include:

- Transformation of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) on Wilmington Avenue into the new Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre which now accommodates 1,100 high school students. CHAT is North America's most successful Jewish community high school with an expected enrollment of 1,300 students next year;
- The expansion of UJA FEDERATION'S Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre;
- The re-location of The Dr. Abraham Shore Academy She'arim Hebrew Day School, Canada's only Jewish day school for children with learning disabilities;
- A traveling My Jewish Discovery Place Children's Museum, which is situated in the BJC, so that other children and their parents can enjoy this popular interactive display;

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's central campus is an excellent example of how agencies and organizations are working toward shared objectives, through a growing number of joint ventures.

■ York Region, the third campus ➤

JTT's BLUEPRINT — Three Campuses for Jewish Life

Helping to take York Region down the right road are Leo Goldhar, left, and Lou Greenbaum. Plans for the York Region campus — which will be developed on a 50-acre site at Bathurst and Weldrick — include schools, day care, an auditorium, cafeteria, resource library, elder centre, a cultural centre and green parks.

The York Region Campus

YORK REGION is currently home to nearly 50,000 Jews, and as Canada's third largest Jewish community, the region's Jewish population is expected to reach over 75,000 in ten years.

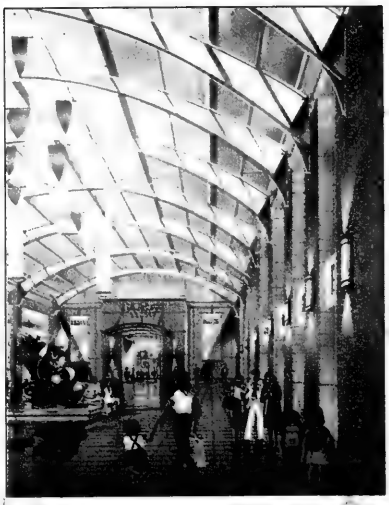
This dramatic northern expansion reveals a vibrant, industrious and well entrenched community with a bright future. Jewish schools, synagogues, businesses and community agencies figure prominently in the suburban scenery stretching east and west of Bathurst Street north of Steeles.

Yet absent from this rapidly developing community is a central Jewish campus — a fully integrated network of facilities and services capable of sustaining a high quality of Jewish life for generations to come.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's vision for York Region revolves around the creation of this central core. To this end a 50-acre property at Bathurst and Weldrick, just south of Major Mackenzie, has been acquired by UJA FEDERATION for the development. "Nothing of this scale has ever been done in the history of our community," notes Morris Perlis, a member of JTT's York Region Planning Committee. "This project represents a completely new and unique approach to community planning that will result in the creation of a modern Jewish environment second to none."

The master plan for the massive development is based on grouping key community facilities together, such as schools, in order to maximize the sharing of resources and expertise. The complex, organized around common spaces and multi-use indoor and outdoor amenities, is designed to encourage interaction among those using the campus on a daily basis. "We want this to be a place where different groups of community members, such as young children and seniors, can come together in a natural setting," explains Perlis.

Plans for this new York Region Jewish campus, subject to community consultation and zoning approvals, include Jewish schools, day care with shared recreational space, a multi-purpose auditorium, a cafeteria, a resource library, community housing, an elder care centre, a cultural centre, green parks, common gathering places and commercial space. In addition, the northern campus will house a wide variety of partner agencies, along with UJA FEDERATION, to meet the needs of this growing community.



Architects are applying a community concept to their designs of the new northern campus, which will house a variety of community agencies.

Looking for Dreamers

Visionaries urge everyone to get involved

BARRY SHERMAN believes the biggest challenge facing the Jewish community today is maintaining the resources needed to ensure a bright tomorrow.

That's why Sherman, one of Jewish Toronto's pre-eminent philanthropists, is leading by example. As co-Chair of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Steering Committee and a driving force behind the conception of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, Sherman is committed to encouraging others to think long term while setting a new personal standard for community giving.

By creating a Perpetual Annual Campaign Endowment, which generates income to ensure a generous yearly UJA FEDERATION campaign gift, Sherman is helping to make it possible for the community to meet its growing needs.

"We are faced with unparalleled needs today but, at the same time, we are presented with an equally unparalleled opportunity to ensure continuity like never before."

LESLIE GALES has 20/20 vision when it comes to the future. She not only knows what kind of Jewish community she wants her children to inherit, she's found a way to make it happen.

As co-Chair of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Steering Committee, her enthusiasm is inspiring and infectious. "Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is a dream come true for anyone who takes pride in our incredible community," says Gales, who together with her family, has set up a Jewish Toronto Tomorrow endowment fund.

"Being involved in this JTT partnership in York Region has allowed my family and I to go beyond our own immediate interests and be a part of the big picture in a truly meaningful way."

"The time to make a difference is now," says MILES NADAL whose capital contribution to Jewish Toronto Tomorrow will help finance the renewal of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

For many community members, including Nadal, the Bloor JCC, with its rich heritage, is as much a symbol of the future as it is of the past.

"My family has had a close connection with Bloor for many years," explains Nadal, who recalls summers spent at the facility's community run day camp. "I'm proud to be associated with an institution of such historical importance to our community."

LEO GOLDHAR is proud of the community he calls home and wants future generations to share his pride by joining the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow vision.

"Toronto is known as one of the greatest places in the world for Jews to live," asserts Goldhar, who has been channeling his enthusiasm and expertise into his chairmanship of the York Region Campus Committee.

Now that a future site for the project has been acquired with his help, Goldhar is focused on igniting the interest of other community members in making the dream a reality.

"JTT is the spark we need to generate the interest of our donors and doers in the future," says Goldhar.

Leo Goldhar

Lou Greenbaum

As President of Associated Hebrew Schools, LOU GREENBAUM has first hand knowledge of the challenges that arise from our community's extraordinary growth.

That's why he didn't hesitate to lend his expertise as a land developer to Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's dream of building a new York Region campus.

"It was a natural fit," explains Greenbaum, who was instrumental in helping to acquire the 50-acre property on Bathurst, south of Major Mackenzie, which will include a wide range of integrated community facilities.

"It's truly an historic endeavour. I'm very excited about getting in on the ground floor of a project of this magnitude and importance."

People working together for one cause. That's what draws MORRIS PERLIS to the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative.

Through his active involvement with the development of JTT's York Region Campus, Perlis has discovered a new pride in the unprecedented cooperative efforts taking place under JTT.

"I'm proud to be a part of the kind of an initiative where people from different backgrounds and geographic corners are coming together under one umbrella," explains Perlis.

They say timing is everything. So when GREG, CHAD AND HENRY WOLFOND, the sons of UJA FEDERATION Campaign 2000 Chair Mel Wolfond and his wife Pedie, were searching for a way to honour their parents' commitment to community, they seized the opportunity to do so through Jewish Toronto Tomorrow.

The Wolfond gift will be used to build a new Centre for Jewish Campus Life near the University of Toronto, at the corner of Huron and Harbord.

"We feel it's very important for Jewish students to have a place to call their own where they can feel comfortable exploring and expressing their Jewish identities. Jewish students already have a strong presence at U of T. This will help make that presence even stronger," says Greg Wolfond.

FRANK AND ANITA EKSTEIN are helping thousands to remember, through their generous support for the expansion of UJA FEDERATION's Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

Their contribution, which will be used for the centre's new Resource Library, is being made by Frank to honour his wife, a survivor, who has been actively involved with the centre's Holocaust education activities for many years.

"The centre is something that is close to our hearts. I'm glad that we can be a part of helping to make it grow so that future generation can learn important lessons from the past," explains Ekstein.

Frank Ekstein is honouring his wife Anita with a contribution to build a Resource Library at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

Al and David Y. Green inside the Bloor Jewish Community Centre. David says the renovation and expansion of the Bloor JCC "symbolizes the kind of community-wide partnership JTT is all about."

THE RENOVATION AND EXPANSION of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre demonstrates how JTT partnerships are building for the future by preserving and enhancing precious elements of the past.

"This project symbolizes the kind of community-wide partnership JTT is all about," explains David Y. Green, a member of JTT's downtown Toronto Planning Committee for the Bloor Jewish Community Centre site. Together UJA FEDERATION and the Bloor Jewish Community Centre devised a strong development plan for the long-awaited project which included a strategy for raising the necessary capital to fund the venture and acquiring expert advice on architectural design.

The enlargement and upgrading of the popular historic site, a joint effort of UJA FEDERATION, the Bloor Jewish Community Centre and key community leaders, is part of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's downtown campus initiative. Professionals and lay leaders have been working closely to develop a sound plan for the site's development as well as fundraising strategies that have already yielded the support of major donors.

"When I first got involved I considered myself both a member of the community and a downtowner," adds Green. "Then, when I saw so many different people sitting around the table for one cause I realized there is no such thing as them and us when it comes to community."

Jewish TORONTO Tomorrow

PARTNERSHIPS here & abroad

JEWISH TORONTO TOMORROW is not only creating closer community ties at home but also in Israel, through Partnership 2000.

One exciting Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative, among many, is a new Teachers Centre in Israel's southern Eilat/Eilot region, which is twinned with Toronto's Jewish community. The centre is the latest example of joint ventures benefiting both Toronto and the Eilat area.

The project's goal is to provide approximately 800 educators working in Eilat/Eilot, who currently must travel north for their professional development needs, with a local training centre. The new facility is also designed to encourage educators to continue working in the desert region outside Eilat.

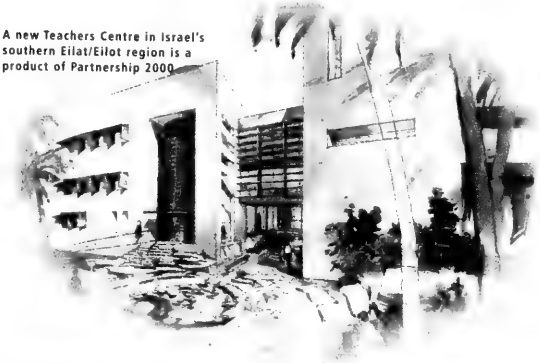
"This type of facility would provide a greater incentive for teachers in the area to remain, in addition to attracting educators from other parts of the country," explains Randy Shiff, co-Chair with Warren Kimel, of UJA FEDERATION's P2K project.

The initiative will also expand educational links between Eilat/Eilot and Toronto through programs such as teacher exchanges.

"Our teachers from Toronto were absolutely exhilarated after they visited Eilat," notes Shiff. "They felt their Israeli counterparts had a great deal to offer in educating our community about the region's unique character. The mutual benefits of this kind of venture are limitless."

CHAT President Baila Lubek, says partnerships secured "the financial resources we needed to accomplish our objective ..."

A new Teachers Centre in Israel's southern Eilat/Eilot region is a product of Partnership 2000.



A PIONEERING PARTNERSHIP between UJA FEDERATION and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto is setting new standards in education and community planning.

The joint venture, which created the new Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre on CHAT's Wilmington-Overbrook campus, is one of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's first forays toward meeting the community's future needs through innovative partnerships.

A joint management committee got the project off to a quick start by securing an immediate capital investment to improve school facilities.

"Professionals and lay people provided leadership and support at a very critical time in our development," explains CHAT President Baila Lubek. "Together we came up with a plan of action to secure the financial resources we needed to accomplish our objective while laying the foundations for a long-term cooperative relationship."

The new campus, which includes upgraded educational and recreational amenities, can now accommodate an expected 1,300 students next year, making it one of the largest Jewish high schools in North America.

"Having UJA FEDERATION as a partner gave us confidence and know-how to plan for the future," adds Lubek. "We achieved a level of trust that I hope will serve as a model for other community agencies and organizations to follow."

MASADA

The sun beat the brown rock to crumble in a haze of heat.
The tourist gawks.

Snake path winds history
Toil to the top
Time is dirt.

The cable car interrupts…
intruders, we must not let Masada fall.
Tourists wipe tears into sweat
while the zealots watch.

The rock rolls history to a hot lady wearing red, white and blue, a straw hat and saddle shoes.

A child collects bottle caps with Hebrew letters, he waves an Israeli flag,
defies the bobby soxer, almost sixty,
sipping coke constantly,
while the martyrs look down from the top of the mountain.

I cringe in the corner where the child sits stare at salt slopes where sea once stood while Lot's lady fanning flies
looks back on S'dom.

The last of the redeemed is free to fall.
The cable car comes down.

THE FOUR CUPS

Like a holy court
We sat, serious and judicial Till someone opened the wine

And our collective head lifted Sniffed

After one cup
I was like a child
Curious

After two
I was an adolescent
Deep in mischief
And the business of others

After three
I grew wicked, greedy
Slapping the table
Poking at others

The fourth, I imbibed only half
Having become an old man
Gentle and content
And given to singing

So I passed it to my brethren
And scanned the room for signs of Eliyahu

May his wisdom seep unto me

Through me
Stay with me throughout the long year

The Store

By MAUREEN ESTELLE RAPPAPORT

They say that love can't be bought, but I remember finding love in a store many years ago. It was a chilly, Montreal winter's evening. My boyfriend, Max, was moving to Hamilton, to a great job, and asked me to come with him. He was asking me to leave my family, the city I was born in, all the places that knew my youth.

He had the irritating habit of chewing loudly with his mouth open; he also chewed his moustache. He wasn't perfect... was anybody?

That evening I felt betrayed. I had wasted a whole afternoon, sitting by the phone, waiting for his call. He promised to call me after his lunch with Barney.

He was leaving tonight for three weeks and he didn't care enough to call to say goodbye. The urge to escape saved me from my lethargy so I dug my winter coat out from the messy closet.

The snow had been falling all day, leaving the sidewalks slushy and slippery; it was hat, gloves and boots weather. A red woolen scarf wound around my neck and face left only my eyes exposed to the night as I wandered aimlessly through the deserted streets.

The snowflakes filled the darkness, blurring my vision, surrounding me in a white fog. A sudden gust of wind cleared the air and in the distance I noticed a little light proclaiming: Gittel's Goodies and Groceries.

My boots were the first to step into the snowdrift in front of the store. I pushed the dirty glass door, left a cold Montreal night, and entered another world.

"Please, miss, vipe your boots."

As I stomped my feet on layers of damp, old newspapers, my eyes sought the owner of that deep, hoarse voice. A little old man, in a grey herring-bone overcoat stood behind the counter, holding a photograph. He gently slid the photo into his pocket.

I smiled as I looked around the store. Boxes and bags cluttered the shelves; sacks of onions and potatoes spilled onto the floor. Before me, on the counter, lay boxes of chocolate-covered orange peel and marzipan stuffed dates.

"You vant to buy somesing?"

I nodded slowly, but didn't know what to say. He looked at me patiently, as if he were trying to coax a confession out of a shy child, and then continued, "Cigarettes, maybe?"

He turned towards the back of the store and shouted, "Gittel, Gittel, come upstairs. Ve have a customer..."

His false teeth danced around his mouth as he spoke.

"No, that's not it," I said, and added stupidly, "I don't even smoke."

"Dat's good because it's a stinky habit, can give you lung cancer, and if dat's not bad enough," he leaned over the jumble on the counter, resting his elbows on a box of sesame snaps, to whisper in my ear, "it's very expensive. Two-fifty a pack. Me and Gitti, we used to share a cigarette between us, after lunch and after supper."

He paused for a moment and looked up at the cracked ceiling. "Ah ... vomen! Gittel, my Gitti, ve need you," he said in a singsong voice.

"My Gittel! Did you know Gittel means Good One in Yiddish?" His eyes then dropped to the floor as he whispered, "but even saints have their faults."

"Um... excuse me, sir...?"

His large ears reddened and his big nose pulled his thin lips into a bashful smile in spite of himself. "It will be our 31st vedding anniversary this March," he said.

My attention drifted to Max, on what it would be like living with him for almost half a century.

"Nu? Tell me, young lady, you vant to buy somesing, or no. I'm a very busy man," and with that he pushed his weight off the counter and turned towards the back of the store.

As I followed the old man down narrow aisles I saw jars of herring, pickled beets, and roasted peppers; boxes of matzah, kasha, egg noodles in the shape of bow-ties; jams of sour cherry, apricot and prune. All this old stuff from Eastern Europe reminded me of my grandmother. I felt inspired.

"Do you have any home-made apple strudel?" I asked capriciously, as if that had been my purpose all along.

His lips stretched his hollow face into that bashful grin again. He was so excited his teeth almost fell out of his mouth.

"Do we have any home-made apple strudel?! Gitti," he exclaimed to the back "did you hear that. Someone vants to know if we have strudel."

He turned his attention to me. "She bakes the sweetest apple strudel..." He dropped his words in midsentence and quickened his pace.

As we passed the barrels of pickles and olives, I saw him stop at the basement door.

"Gitteleh, I'm here..." he cooed gently in Yiddish as he poked his head through the door.

By this time, I was very curious to meet Gittel so I, too, poked my head down the dark staircase. I could barely see a dim light flickering in a far off corner.

Expecting to hear music, a horn and fiddle, or to smell the sweet scent of hot apples and cinnamon, I leaned closer, but was suddenly stopped by a pinch on my arm and the bad smell of his breath.

"Be careful, you shouldn't fall," he shouted in my face.

His hands trembled as he pushed me away from the basement's door. He looked as startled as I was. "Eh ... excuse me, but only Gittel goes there," he pulled a hankie out of his pocket and wiped his bumpy nose and little colourful eyes.

When he was satisfied I was following him, he turned around and began the return journey to the front of the store.

"Ach... she'll be up when it's time," he offered in explanation. "It vill be ready when it's ready."

Looking back on it now, I should have thought his behaviour odd, but I was comfortable there, among the barrels of pickles and olives; among the sacks of onions and potatoes. I picked up a dusty bottle of kosher Concord wine.

"This bottle reminds me of Passover, of the seders at my aunt Minnie's house," I said, trying to lighten things up. "She's been married three times already!"

"And you?" he asked. "You married?"

I shook my head and told him I was, sort of, thinking about it. Then the night's events led me to unburden some of my troubles with Max. "How did your marriage survive over all those years?"

"Ve are survivors. And ve do what ve have to do. To survive."

"How did you choose her? How did you know she was the right one?" My questions escaped, unbidden.

"Hah. 'How did I choose?' she asks." He stopped to rub a stubby pointy chin. "I was secretly engaged to her before we ever met, before I even knew anything about it!"

"What do you mean? How can that be?"

"At 18, she was in Auschwitz. The girl next to her on the hard wooden pallet vas my sister Bleema. Bleema filled Gitti's ears with stories of her smart and handsome brother. That's me." His cheeks and stuck-out ears flushed as he smiled, "and between those two, they cooked up a plan. In the camp, while they worked, through all those terrible days, they planned that Bleema would introduce Gittel to me, and we would marry."

"And that's what happened?"

"Yes, it happened just like that. Somehow, we did what we had to and we all survived. Bleema introduced us, here in Canada, and ve were married one month later, in May 1948."

"And she really married you, just like that?"

"Sure. Why not? I vasn't so ugly then."

I looked at him, to see if he was telling me the truth, if there was something he was hiding. "But were you happy together? Were you right for each other?"

"Ach... happy, shmappy? We had a life together, a family, a shop... We survived."

We were back at the front counter. I saw him remove a photo and lay it gently on the shelf. There, in between chocolate coins and apricot leather, I glimpsed a worn black and white photo of a laughing young woman leaning against a tree; Max had a similar one of me. Would it, too, be torn around the edges 30 years from now?

I put on my gloves and wound the scarf around my neck. I didn't think Gittel would be coming up that night. There would be no apple strudel, but I knew that I, somehow, got what I came for.

"I better be going back home. I'm expecting a call."

"Ach go. I don't want people loitering around my store." He turned and yelled to the back, "Gittel, never mind about the baking, she changed her mind."

He continued talking to her as I pushed the heavy glass door and left the store.

Passover Greetings

RELATIVE TIME

Our six year old, then five, ran out of school onto the playground chasing a friend into a game with no rules except to be absorbed into the chase and the run.

Our eight year old touches my face while talking with fingers like twigs, smooth and fine. It reminds me she's younger than her first-born status permits.

These girls love to look at the family photo album and see themselves even younger than they are.
I look over their shoulders to pictures of us, years before them.
It seems we too were always younger than we seemed to ourselves at the time.

Your Bubby died in an almost unrecognizable old age.
We were relieved.
Only her friends Ray and Jenny, who knew her time, grieved deeply that she had run out of it.

CANTOR STEIN

He always wears what I assume to be the costume of the Jewish Bourgeois Performer before the Destruction.
His broad silk tie is folded like a scarf onto a starched white shirt linked at the cuffs with gold and pearl.
And of course, he wears a proper black hat which sets off his neatly trimmed, but full white handlebar mustache and beard.

Ours is not the grand European Synagogue where he headlined – in fact we're in a basement with a ceiling that leaks.
Nevertheless, with the quiet pride and practised grasp of every detail of the diplomatic protocols, he still sings the blessings to the Creator of the Universe, to the Lord of our World.

Only his hands seem unrehearsed, as if the training he received was silent on the matter, so that he never quite knew what to do with them.
They do not studiously ball up in fists or open palms upward to beseech mercy or invite the congregation to sing along.
Services begin with his arms by his side but soon his fingers reach up out of the cuffs and tighten on to the edge of the bimah, tighter now at every service.
He refuses to let go of us or of Him, in spite of the Destruction and a basement in Golden America with a ceiling that leaks.
His hands have told me he is a human link to join onto.
I have to think this answers in part his prayers.

COMMITMENT

Many words were spoken here this morning,
Another ceremony, another hour that slips away…
And so, we return to our lives, to the lives we bear in our empty hands
As if nothing happened.

And again, we return to our lives;
and again we return to violent ways,
To self-centredness, into the shell in which we hide
As if nothing could harm us.

But can nothing harm us?

What have I, what have you understood from it all?
From the disgusting thing that happened to us
So long ago…
Was it only four years ago?
Does it all belong to the past?
Does it all belong to the present?
And to the future as well?

But the future is us.
I and you.

Will time simply cleanse the memories
Will we simply sit around holding hands
Because that's what there is?
Because there isn't anything more to do?
Because, in any event, the work is for others to do?

Will we be able, even for a tiny instant,
To arrest that time
Within our hearts
And try, at least try
To become better people,
Attentive, courteous,
Not berating, not demanding,
Compromising a bit, helping out a bit?

And don't answer: "Sure, but tomorrow."

There isn't time. The future has to begin today.
Right now. At this very moment.
Because tomorrow will be too late.

הרבה מילים נאמרו כאן, הבוקר.
עוד טקס, עוד שעה שחולפת...
וכך חוזרים לחיים, לחיינו כוזיים ריקות,
כאילו שום דבר לא קרה.
ושוב חוזרים לחיים, ושוב חוזרים לאלימות,
ולאנוכיות, ולבועה שבה תמיד מסתתרים,
כאילו שום דבר לא יכול לפגוע בנו.
אכן שום דבר לא יכול לפגוע בנו?

מה אני ומה אתה, ואת ואתם
הבנו מכל זה?
מהזוועה שקרתה אז,
לפני הרבה זמן, לפני... ארבע שנים?
הכל שייך לעבר?
הכל שייך להווה?

אך העתיד זה אנחנו.
אני ואתה, ואת ואתם.
האם ניתן לזמן לשטוף
את כל הזיכרונות
ואנו נשב כחיבוק ידיים
כי זה מה יש?
כי אין מה לעשות?
כי זוהי מלאכה של אחרים?

האם נוכל לרגע קט
לעצור את הזמן
בתוך ליבנו
ולנסות, רק לנסות,
להיות יותר טובים,
קשובים, ואדיבים
ולא לצעוק ולא לדרוש
קצת לותר, קצת לעזור?
ואל תגידו: "כן, מחר"
אין זמן. את העתיד
יש להתחיל כבר מהיום.
עכשיו, ברגע זה.
מחר יהיה כבר מאוחר.

Escape

By JOSEPH PERETZ

We were in the grip of winter. An icy wind shook our barrack. The wooden walls creaked with every gust that blew a fine granular snow across the bleak landscape.

Harry, with whom I shared a bunk-bed, and I were part of a crew transporting logs from the woods to the charcoal ovens. The Germans needed an alternative energy to propel their non-essential vehicles, thus saving precious fuel for the war effort.

After almost two years, this part of the French Ardennes lush forests were nearing depletion.

We held whispered talks about escaping since I planned to join my girlfriend, living safely under an assumed name, in northern France. Whenever I broached the subject with Harry, he would answer "soon", and so the days went by.

On Jan. 3, 1944, after rollcall we were ordered to pack our belongings and be ready to be re-assigned to another labour camp the next day, since the charcoal operation was coming to an end.

As we were not given any details about the impending change, everybody in the barrack started guessing and offered their own opinion as to what was in store for us. In the meantime they all started to bundle up their meagre belongings.

Starting with Harry, I went around the barrack, trying to convince everyone that this was a good time to make a break for it and escape in the night. Some of them looked at me as if I was out of my mind. I could envisage the consternation of the guards after we had all flown the coop.

I tried to counter every argument. Where would they run to? What if some got caught? Why take a chance? I talked and talked till lights out, but all my arguments and dire predictions fell on deaf ears. So, on the dark, I started packing too, making sure to put all the essentials in my pockets in case I had to leave my luggage behind.

Lying on my upper bunk, I stretched my legs upward to lift up one of the ceiling panels. I contemplated crawling up there and hide till everybody was gone. But I started thinking; what if I froze up there or worse, what if the Germans set fire to the barrack after it was emptied. No, I would go with the others and escape at the first opportunity.

At early rollcall I noticed at the gate two Volkswagens from which several civilians in long leather coats emerged. Gestapo! They checked our names off from a list.

An open truck was waiting for us. We climbed in the back, carrying our belongings. Two guards, armed with rifles and side arms joined us in the back of the truck.

As we drove out of the camp, I took a last look at the place where I spent the past 18 months. Somehow we had felt safe there.

Was it going to be another labour camp or one of the places our guard mentioned upon return from leave to his native Poland. He had told us that there were camps where Jews were being gassed and burned. Of course we did not believe him and thought it was just another way to demoralize us.

The Gestapo followed us till our truck pulled up in the railroad yard at Charleville. We were ordered off the truck, marched to a row of cattle cars and herded into one of them. Trapped!

My first thought was of my girlfriend. Would I ever see her again?

The sliding door was left open. A Feldgendarme, or military policeman, was guarding us. He cradled a machine gun in his arms. I saw a truck pull up on the platform and unload a number of older men, women and children, who, like us, wore the yellow Star of David on their chests. They were assigned the boxcar next to ours. Now I was convinced that our destination would not be another labour camp.

As we seemed to be waiting for the other cars to be filled, I walked up to the Feldgendarme and asked if he would allow us to come out and stretch our legs. He permitted us to walk up and down the platform as long as he could keep an eye on us.

Five or six platforms separated us from the station. Now and then a train pulled in. Passengers got off, some others on – before chugging out of the station. I could not help but envy those lucky people who could come and go as they pleased.

Every so often, trucks would disgorge more bewildered Jews who huddled together in their designated car.

Together with Harry, we strolled in silence back and forth on the platform, every time going a bit further. At one point we reached the end car of the train. As we stopped, I saw the Feldgendarme looking at us. Afraid that he might get suspicious since we stopped moving, I thought of an excuse to stand still.

I said quietly to Harry: "Let's stand here and pretend to pee."

I unbuttoned my coat and looked sideways at the Feldgendarme watching us. I waited till he turned his head to watch the people strolling on the other side of him.

At that moment I whispered: "Let's jump."

"Not now" were the last words I heard as I jumped down from the platform, my throat constricted, my heart thumping in my chest.

It was only about four feet from the platform to the tracks, yet I felt as if I had dived headlong into a bottomless abyss. Hoping that the railroad car would shield me from the guard's view, I subconsciously expected to hear the bark of his machine gun firing at my back. In a crouch, I ran as fast as I could, ripping off my yellow Star of David and stuffing it in my pocket.

I ran across at least a dozen tracks till I reached a low brick wall which I had no trouble scaling. I stopped running but walked at a brisk pace. I turned on the next side street and crossed a dimly lit underpass. I emerged on the main street of Charleville where the station fronted.

Acting nonchalant, I walked in, ambled to a wicket and bought a ticket for the next train out. I had an almost two-hour wait. Afraid to linger around the station, fearing that they may be out looking for me (being over six feet tall, I would be easily spotted) I went out, crossed the road and ducked into a barber shop. Anything to get off the street.

'I closed my eyes and said a silent goodbye'

Hiding behind a newspaper, I sat down and waited my turn. The barber wrapped a white cape around me, a perfect camouflage.

Soon my face was covered with a warm, fragrant lather. The shave, with hot towel treatment, was followed by a haircut and, since I had lots of time to kill, I treated myself to a scalp massage. I closed my eyes and avoided all conversation with the nosy and talkative barber.

I listened to the dialogue between the client in the chair next to mine and the barber giving him a haircut. They seemed to disagree on the chances of the local soccer team winning next Sunday's game against a visiting club. It sounded as if they had no other worries in the world, while I was running for my life.

Once in a while, I peered in the mirror, looking at the window behind me, somehow expecting to see a patrol scouring the neighbourhood, looking for the escapee.

A sudden panic took hold of me when I realized the enormity of my bold getaway. I firmly grasped the armrests of the chair to keep myself from shaking.

With a flourish the barber undraped me, snapping the cape to discard the residue of his handiwork. With leaden legs, I plodded back to the station, hunched down to make myself look shorter. A light snow had started to fall as dusk set in.

Thankfully, the interior of the station was dimly lit. My train was on time. I hastily climbed up into an empty compartment and slumped down in a seat by the window, trembling with fear.

In the twilight I saw, a few platforms away, people shuffling back and forth in front of a freight train.

I could distinguish the helmeted Feldgendarme guarding them. Tears sprang to my eyes as my train slowly started moving out of the station.

Sinking back in my seat, I closed my eyes and said a silent goodbye to my buddies. I thought I would never see them again. I was wrong.

Of those who made the journey, only one came back.

All the others died in Auschwitz.

Mendel's Trees

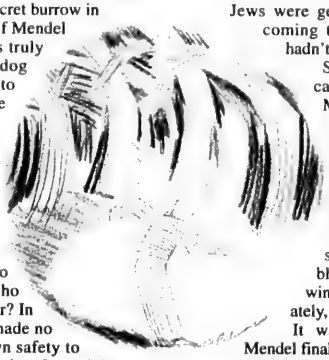
By RUTH STERN WARZECHA

At first glance, he looked absurd, running through the woods in striped pyjamas and oversized shoes. Both absurd and impractical, for the wind's chill was increasing as evening approached. Not even a fool should be running, dressed only in pyjamas, far from the nearest house.

However, this man seemed to find the cold, darkening woods comforting, for when he reached a place where the trees grew thickly, he finally stopped. He was panting from his exertions, his heart thumped within its bony cage and sweat trickled into the dirty hollows of his cheeks.

But Mendel was finally safe ... for now.

Poor Mendel in the striped pyjamas had nowhere to go and no one who wanted him. Even if he had known that just a short jog away, there was a neat little farmhouse, he could not go there. Its warm hearth was not for him. Not even a secret burrow in the hayloft was safe. If Mendel did go there, and was truly lucky, the farmer's dog would be set on him, to drive him away. In the topsy-turvy world inhabited by Mendel, this would be kindness.



Then again, the farmer might insist that he remain, at least until he or his body could be turned over to the authorities. And who could blame the farmer? In these crazy times, it made no sense to risk one's own safety to harbour a Jew. Turning in a Jew might be well rewarded, and everyone knew that the Jews were getting only what was coming to them, for after all hadn't they killed our Lord!

Such was the ecumenical weight carried by Mendel. But in his hunger, cold, fear and exhaustion, he was closer to animal than to man. Right there, like an animal, Mendel curled up on the ground where two stout tree trunks blocked the worst of the wind, and almost immediately, he was asleep.

It was very late before Mendel finally moaned and stirred. The night sky was clear, as the wind had blown away all the clouds and the full moon shone with an icy brilliance. Mendel clumsily got to his feet and looked at the night sky. The rich stars reminded him of his synagogue's chandelier.

Then Mendel's eyes began to fill with water and the night lights blurred. In the misery of remembrance, Mendel groaned. And then he spoke, his voice startling a sparrow sleeping in a branch just above his head.

"Master of the universe, I am grateful that You saved my life. Even though my existence is bitter, life is still sweet to me. In Your infinite kindness, You showed me how to escape. But now You show me the moon, so round and clear, to remind me that today is my father's yahrzeit and I need to recite the Kaddish. You mock me, Almighty. You have wiped out my shtetl, maybe even all the Jews in existence, but You leave me this impossible obligation. I cannot begin to understand the mystery of your ways, O Lord!"

'The little sparrow... watched his rhythms'

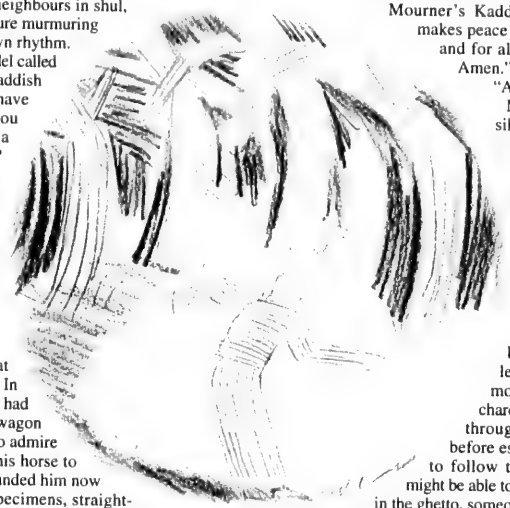
A gust of wind blew hard, and in response, the oak trees around Mendel creaked and shook. Mendel was downcast, for the moaning of the wind as it blew among the trees parodied his own misery and the swaying of the trees reminded him of his old neighbours in shul, each prayer-shawled figure murmuring and undulating to his own rhythm.



In exasperation, Mendel called out, "Who will recite Kaddish for me, O Lord, after I have frozen to death? Will you spare the lives of even a quorum of Jewish men? Or perhaps You will convene a minyan of angels? Maybe You will establish minyanim of willows to pray day and night for the memory of the vanished Jewish people?"

Around Mendel thousands of leaves trembled. Mendel looked around at the oaks that circled him. In his previous life, Mendel had been known to stop his wagon for a moment, as much to admire the scenery as to allow his horse to rest. The oaks that surrounded him now were particularly fine specimens, straight-backed and fully leafed; but they swayed and creaked like a congregation of elders lost in God's words.

Mendel knew he had to leave the forest soon, but he couldn't move. How like a Jew to be concerned with problems of religious ritual when even survival was doubtful! Well, the Almighty had created this dilemma but Mendel would try his best to solve it.

Mendel stood straight, pointed his forefinger at the nearest oak and called aloud, "One." He pointed to the next one and called out, "Two." Then he counted each of the remaining trees until he had numbered nine in the circle.

He then closed his eyes, placed his feet together and began to sway with the trees. "Yisgadal viyiskadash shmay raboh," he began.

"Amen," the trees creaked. A sudden gust set them shaking passionately.

Mendel continued chanting and finished the Mourner's Kaddish with "May He who makes peace above, make peace for us and for all of Israel and let us say, Amen."

"Amen," the oaks responded. Mendel continued to sway silently.

The little sparrow who had been awakened by Mendel's voice watched his rhythms until her eyes began to close and she fell asleep again, safe and warm in her nest, at her breast four eggs holding the promise of eternity.

The Kaddish had blown away Mendel's lethargy. He remembered a monastery surrounded by orchards, which he had glimpsed through the boxcar slats just before escaping. If he did manage to follow the train tracks back, he might be able to find the place again. Back in the ghetto, someone had spoken of Catholic priests who had been arrested for hiding Jews. Imagine that!

Mendel looked up at the sky one last time, and by the moon's brightness, calculated the direction he must walk.

This was, of course, a crazy and desperate plan, but what else could one expect of a man in striped pyjamas running through the woods. A crazy man who stopped just long enough to say Kaddish with a minyan of trees.

Then he walked away.

IN A POLISH VILLAGE

Leah, seventeen, composed a blushing meteor, precious coddle is betrothed.
Aaron, scholar, voice lyric ambles into the parlour hat in hand
stoops his lanky length into armchair creases.
Whisked away, he bumps onto the rug,
wags a finger at bobbing black curls.
Posing for hours in high-throated emerald head tilted at cobwebs, Leah dreams and her likeness emerges in vivid oils.

The Last Dayenu

By ANN SZEDLECKI

The annual rites of spring began when the housewives dumped the old straw from the mattresses and replaced it with fresh smelling straw.

Passover couldn't be far off. My mother's homemade wine was distilled, drop after drop running through clean linen, leaving a deposit. The linen was changed a few times until the wine was clear.

A large jar held cut-up red beets, and water to the top that was going to ferment. Vinegar was not allowed because it is a product of wheat – chametz – and there was also our borsht.

Our large laundry basket, by now well scrubbed and lined with a large white sheet, was ready to store the matzah.

We had Passover dishes and cutlery, but the pots and pans – we didn't have a Passover set – were made kosher by a man who pulled a wagon containing metal vats with hot water. By dipping the pots and pans in the water, the cookware was declared kosher for Passover.

The task of buying me shoes fell to my aunt

My public school, Number 132 in Lodz, was located on Wierzbowa Number 19 – the Willow Street – which only Jewish girls attended. Classes were taught in Polish.

Before Rosh Hashanah, we were asked to bring some items to be distributed among needy students. The same went for Passover. The food tank was an old tradition. We never knew who was being helped; all I knew was that I was the giver. This tradition was instilled in me from an early age.

For Passover, I was outfitted in new clothing – new ribbons for my braids, new underwear and socks, a dress and finally new shoes. My mother always took me shopping, but in the spring of 1939, she could not spare the time.

We had an addition in our family. My 23-year-old sister had given birth to a baby girl – Miriam – making me an aunt at almost 14. My mother was busy helping my sister cope with the baby.

The task of buying me shoes fell to my aunt, Tauba Glika, my mother's middle sister, who was childless. Sarah Rivka, my youngest aunt – she was also childless – had been thrown out of Germany a year before. She had enough problems of her own and couldn't participate in our Passover preparations.

Upon entering the shoe store my aunt immediately asked for a pair of flat, black patent-leather shoes with a strap, the kind I had worn since the age of five. My eyes were drawn to a pair of blue suede pumps trimmed with pink leather Xs and – most important – a three-centimetre heel.

My mind was made up. I wanted those shoes. A battle of wills ensued: it was to be those shoes or none. I emerged victorious, much to the delight of my sister, who applauded me for asserting my independence. By the way, she liked the shoes so much that she wore them sometimes too.

The wooden floor of our kitchen was scoured with sand to get out the oil stains left by the sewing machines. The kitchen was my father's working area as well as my mother's cooking domain.

The only other room was a dining room minus our beautiful black, dining set. The table and chairs had been repossessed by the city for nonpayment of taxes. It was just as well, there was no place for the set.

'The afikoman...was easy to find'

The other half of the room had two beds – one lounge for my brother and a metal child's bed for me. It was really getting too short.

Red wax was applied to the floor and allowed to dry. Finally, a heavy polisher was pushed manually to give the floor a shine.

After all these preparations, we followed our father through the house on an evening before the first seder. With candles in our hands – he held a feather – we went through every corner to get out the last bits of chametz trapped in the crevices. The chametz was to be burned the next morning.

By noon the next day, everything was ready for the festivities. The beautifully ironed white tablecloth, the polished sterling silver candlesticks, the arm chair where my father was going to sit leaning on a huge pillow. On the table were china, cutlery, napkins, wine glasses and a beautifully embroidered matzah cover where my father would sit. On the round plate, a roasted egg, a shank bone, bitter herbs and so on.

Mouth watering smells emanated from the kitchen. My stomach was growling. But it would have to wait.

My sister, her husband and the baby arrived. There were six adults, but only four chairs. The lounge was put against the table for me and my older brother Shoel.

The women lit the candles, said the blessings, the Haggadot were opened and the seder began. My brother asked the Four Questions, even though I was the youngest (except for the baby). I checked Elijah's cup to see if he had drunk from it.

Everything went smoothly until we reached Dayenu. As far as I could remember I always giggled when I heard this song. This year, I was almost 14 years old and an aunt. I had hoped I had outgrown the laughing.

No such luck. As we came closer to Dayenu my father's blue eyes beneath bushy black brows fixed on me as if asking me to behave. I got up from the table, hand on my mouth. When I reached the kitchen the giggles I was holding back erupted.

> It would be many years before I heard Dayenu again

A short time later I rejoined the family. The afikoman was on top of the wardrobe and easy to find. My sister, her husband and the baby left quite late.

I had trouble falling asleep. I was waiting for the morning to arrive so I could put all my new clothes on to impress my friends. The aroma from the kitchen woke me up.

My mother was preparing breakfast for me. It wasn't very fancy. During Passover she served either matzah brie or bubbala with lots of eggs. In those days we didn't worry about cholesterol.

Tea with lemon followed. My special treat was sponge cake with wine. Pouring the wine over the cake, I waited for the liquid to be absorbed. It tasted heavenly, just like a tort.

After breakfast I joined my girl friends in the courtyard. We played some hopscotch and my new shoes got scuffed. A brush with special bristles fixed the shoes.

My aunt Sarah Rivka, the Berliner, came to join us for lunch. Afterwards she took me to see a movie, The Great Waltz.

My Aunt was a very attractive woman in her 40s. Beautifully dressed, she drew admiring glances from the holiday crowd filling the main streets on this warm, sunny spring day full of promise.

On the way home we passed Rumba, the new ice-cream parlour. It was crowded. I was tempted to go in, but I resisted it. I remember being so proud walking beside Sarah Rivka. I didn't want the day to end, but it was getting late and the preparations for the second seder were in full swing.

I wondered how I would react to Dayenu that night. To tell the truth, I don't remember. But it would be many years before I heard Dayenu again. By then, I didn't find the song funny.

The beautiful time we shared as a family was shattered and taken away from us so tragically. Nothing but fond memories remain.

WHERE, OH WHERE?

Who will take Mamma
Who will it be
All of us want her
We all seem to agree
We'll call a meeting
We'll gather the clan
There's brothers and sister
Surely one of them can.
Strange how we thought
She'll never wear out.
See how she walks
It's arthritis, no doubt.
Her eyesight is failing,
Her memory's dim
She's apt to insist
On the silliest whim
When Mamma got older
She became such a care
She must have a home
The question is where?
Remember the days
When she was so spry,
Baked her own strudel,
Baked her own pie
Kissed away troubles
Wiped up our tears
Told us a story
Shut out our fears
Wonderful Mamma
We loved her so
Isn't it dreadful
Whose place will she go?
One little corner
Is all she would need,
A shoulder to cry on Books she can't read
A chair by the window,
The sun coming through,
Some pretty spring flowers
Still covered with dew
Warmed with love
So she won't mind the cold.
Oh, who will take Mamma
Now that she's old?
Nobody wants her
Hopefully there's one
Willing to give her
A place in the sun.
She won't have to worry
Or wonder or doubt
She won't be a problem
To bother about,
Up there in Heaven
They've saved her a place
Her Yiddishe soul
Will have its own space!

THE HOLOCAUST

Help Me God

They are taking me away
I am going, all alone
They hit me very hard
I can hear myself groan

There is hardly air to breathe, because they've stuffed me in a train
I miss my relatives so much
It's hard fighting the pain

Why did this have to happen to me?
I'm only eleven years old
I'm trying not to cry in front of them, to show them I can be bold

As I take a long look around myself
I see lots of other boys
Everyone is just sitting by themselves
Making the occasional sigh of noise

After days of sitting in the train,
I have not eaten a thing
I pray for my relatives back in the ghetto, and to God this song I sing:

Help me God
My days are numbered
I pray for my soul,
My life's being tortured

Help me God
I am scared – a lot
Will this war ever end?
Why did lives have to be lost?

I am asking You now to hear my prayers
To end this war for everyone

Help me God, I can't go on
Help me God, Help me God

MY FAMILY'S JEWISH TREASURE

My family has a lot of treasures,
Our sforim give us lots of pleasures.

We love to learn day and night,
To keep our spirits bright with light.

Whenever we sit down to learn,
A tiny spark begins to burn.

We gain knowledge from our learning,
And observe everything with great yearning.

Into the wee hours of the night we sometimes sit,
Until we fully understand that everything should fit.

After a day of learning with our sforim we say "Shema" at night,
And are satisfied that everything we learned is just right.

Another day has brought us closer to HaShem,
And we cherish that feeling even more than a gem.

With great hope and imagination,
We only wish that this treasure will pass from generation to generation.

by Meira Gelkopf, 11 years old

I WILL NOT FORGET

My Mother told me to run,
My Father told me to hide.
But I didn't, I was too full of pride.

They carted us away,
With barely any room to breathe,
a baby was crying, we fell to our knees.

When we finally got out,
Gasping for air,
I felt our family spirit was no longer there.

The sign at the door,
"Work makes you Free,"
No one heard our crying, our bitterness, our plea.

My Mother was gassed,
My father was too,
There were too few of us, too few.

The "bunks" were terrible,
"Food" was always on a ration
It took all of our strength to relieve temptation

We wanted to defeat them,
We wanted our families back,
But we knew to have this we must last.

When Liberation came,
We hugged & kissed,
vowed nothing else should happen like this.

And now dear friends,
It is all up to you,
Be proud of who you are, be proud you're a Jew.

I would like to dedicate my poem to my father's and mother's side and to all people who lost someone in the Holocaust.

Passover Greetings

The Reason

By BRENNA NITKIN,
11 years old

After I had been away so long, it felt good to return, although I wondered if things had changed a lot since I left for my mission. Don't get me wrong. Although I was only 12 years old, I did have a mission. My mission was to find my seven-year-old sister Rachel and save her from a death she didn't deserve. Unfortunately, I was found hiding in the abandoned bakery across the street and brought to Auschwitz.

I'm on a train now. It's not a freight train like the Nazis used when they shipped me off to Auschwitz. It's a real train with padded seats and uniformed people who come around offering you things to eat and drink. This train will take me back to my mother and father, but not to Rachel. She was killed in the gas chambers at Auschwitz.

Sitting beside me is my best friend Eva. Her whole family was killed by the Nazis, so I'm going to ask Mama if she can come to live with us.

Eva is combing her beautiful, red hair. She sees tears in my eyes and touches the stubble on my head. I had lice in the camp, so a lady came up to me with a big pair of scissors and chopped my hair off unevenly and messily. My hair is starting to grow back now, and I've got a layer of stubble on my head.

"Your hair will be much prettier when it grows back," Eva soothes quietly while she strokes the stubble on my head.

The train stops abruptly and my body is thrown against Eva's. The doors open and I look around frantically for my parents.

I clutch Eva's hand, and we walk around the town square of my home city, Paris.

I smell fresh baking baguettes, and memories flood back to the days when Rachel and I would watch the baker, Monsieur Pouler, knead the dough to make crisp, tasty baguettes. His thick, curly moustache was swirled up at the tips, and it moved up and down as he sang French melodies. I know that Monsieur Pouler was Jewish and I missed his strong, playful voice.

Suddenly, Eva tugs on my sleeve so hard that I almost fall flat on my face.

"Regarde! Look!" Eva gasps, pointing her finger at a woman coming towards us.

Your hair will be much prettier when it grows back

"Hannah?" the woman asks questioningly.

"Mama?" I choke out.

The woman grabs me by my blouse and swings me around in circles.

"Ma bébé!" my mother cries joyfully.

I look my mother carefully in the eyes asking her a question to which I already know the answer.

"Rachel?" I whisper softly.

My mother looks down at the cobblestone street and I know not to ask about my younger sister again.

While I have a wonderful reunion with my mother, Eva anxiously glares at me as if she is urging me to ask my mother about her.

"Mama," I say in French. "C'est Eva. Est-ce qu'elle peut vivre avec nous?"

"Oui, oui," Mama murmurs with tears in her eyes. She scoops Eva up and kisses the top of her head. "Viens ici."

Mama smiles. She takes both of our hands and leads us out of the town square.

As we pass our old street, I ask Mama why we aren't going to our old house. Mama looks down at the cobblestone street once more, and I know this is another topic I should not talk about.

Then we turn onto a beautiful street and Mama fishes a key out of her purse and opens the door.

She leads us upstairs to a bedroom where a man lies very sick in bed. I don't need to look twice to know that this is my father. I leap onto the bed and cry for everyone and everything that was killed in this tragedy.

"Papa, what happened to you?" I cry.

"Pneumonia," Papa grunts weakly.

Mama sends Eva and me to bed. We both cry bitterly.

"Eva," I say, "I know why Rachel is dead and Papa's almost dead."

"So do I!" Eva cringes. "Because the Nazis are murderers."

"No," I shake my head. "God needed help in heaven because of all the death the Nazis caused, so he chose little, innocent Rachel to help him."

"You're right," Eva nods wiping away her tears. "We are very fortunate to have such a magnificent little girl to watch over us from heaven."

I smile, and shut off the light.

Abdullah meets Barak in Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

EILAT — Jordan's King Abdullah and his wife Queen Rania, accompanied by a host of ministers, took a brief sail recently across the Gulf of Aqaba to Eilat.

This was Abdullah's first visit to Israel since ascending to his country's throne.

His visit to Eilat lasted only four hours, but included a private meeting with Prime Minister Ehud Barak, a brief tour of the southern resort town – which he called beautiful – and a visit to a fish breeding plant in the sea, where he expressed great interest in ways to bring the technology to Jordan and voiced concern over environmental issues.

The visit included ministerial-level meetings between Regional Co-operation Minister Shimon Peres, Industry Minister Ran Cohen, Communications Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer and their Jordanian counterparts, including Jordan's water minister, industry minister and tourism minister.

Although no joint press conference took place – despite advance scheduling for such an event – the king conducted taped interviews with Israel TV, in which he called his relationship with Barak "terrific," expressing "admiration" for Barak's "courage – and great responsibility."

He told Israel TV that he envisions a political solution for Jerusalem that has "two levels."

'Quite a bitter victory'

By FRANCES KRAFT

TORONTO — The verdict in the recent London trial that pitted American historian Deborah Lipstadt against plaintiff David Irving, the British Holocaust denier, was "quite a bitter victory," according to the 44-year-old University of Waterloo professor of architecture who served as an expert witness in the case.

Although Lipstadt and her team celebrated their victory, "there was a real sense that this was a completely obscene issue we'd been involved in," said Robert Jan Van Pelt in an interview at his home last week, following his return to Canada.

"When you're a Jew – and I am a Jew – there's something disconcerting in someone denying your own history and the history of your people."

A native of Holland born to a Jewish mother and non-Jewish father, Van Pelt was named for an uncle who was killed in Auschwitz.

Personal thoughts on a bygone era

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

In 1937, the vice-principal of Central High School of Commerce came into our graduating accounting class as a visitor to announce that there was a job opening.

"There is no reason for any Jewish student to apply for this job because the employer doesn't want a Jew," he said.

That wouldn't happen today, thankfully, because of anti-discrimination laws.

But it does illustrate the gulf that separates me, as a student in that class, from the present generation. I only know that my contemporaries and I had to fight hard for any success we achieved. This is not to say that the present generation does not work hard, but it's in a different atmosphere.

One of my fellow students was the late Lewis Moses who became a towering figure in the Zionist movement. Another was Howard Orfus who became a successful developer and had a street named after him.

Others, including myself, had less spectacular careers, and, unfortunately, a lot of them are no longer with us. (My own career was in journalism, and after stints at the Ottawa Journal, and the Toronto Star, and as a professor at Sheridan College in Oakville, I ended up writing for the Canadian Jewish News on a part-time basis.)

It was a far different Jewish community then.

For recreation we went to the Jewish Boys Club on Simcoe Street, or when the family could afford it, to see a Jewish stage show at the Standard Theatre on Spadina Avenue.

In the 1930s we played tennis in the "gully" courts in Bellwoods Park with hand-strung racquets with wire. Bill Forman, Bernie Laytner, Maurice Cerezni, and Murray Weinberg were among the players. Those courts are no more, and the "gully" has disappeared.

There was plenty of interest in young Zionist clubs (socialist, labour or what have you) and they met in dingy, second-floor rooms most of the time.

The big thrill was to save up a quarter to go to Shea's vaudeville on Bay Street on the weekend to see a movie and a stage show featuring stars of the day such as Ben Bernie. It was in those days that you could go to the Duchess Theatre on Dundas Street near Bathurst for 10 cents (including a free popsicle) to see an afternoon show.

Just down the street, on Dundas, was a fruit store run by Ed Mirvish, now the Royal Alexandra Theatre entrepreneur and proprietor of Honest Eds whose garish lights twinkle at Bloor and Bathurst streets.

We arrived in Toronto in 1933 from Bowmanville, 50 miles away, where my late father, David, had a dry goods store. He often travelled in the country thereabouts trading goods for chickens and eggs which he sold in Toronto.

After we moved, I attended Charles G. Fraser public school on Manning Avenue.

I had my bar mitzvah at the Shaw Street Shul, now part of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, a Conservative shul in Downsview.

It was at the old Shaw Street Shul that I said Kaddish for my father in 1935. He died in his bed at the age of 57 at 1103 Dundas St., W. because there was no penicillin or other antibiotics at that time to combat pneumonia.

My mother had me go round in the middle of the night to rouse my second cousin, Yechiel Berman, on Givins Street to tell him the sad news.

My late mother (Rose was her first name) died in 1946 in Ottawa of cancer.

At that time, in the '30s, it was known that the more affluent Jews attended Goel Tzedec or the McCaul Street Synagogue, or the Reform Holy Blossom Temple, while others went to smaller shuls, some of them in shtiebls or unfinished basements.

For some reason, the Men of England Synagogue on Spadina Avenue (it is no more) was the focus of a lot of attention.

My father's Romanian cousins and friends persuaded him to attend the old Romanian shul downtown that eventually became Adath Israel Synagogue.

The bitter political battles between then-Communist J.B. Salsberg and Conservative party standard-bearer Allan Grossman were legion, and those of us who were still politically innocent learned the hard way to lose our innocence.

There was no Jewish power or real electoral clout for Jews in the 1930s until war broke out, and most Jews were satisfied to try to make a living and stay out of harm's way.

It is a real eye-opener today to see the Canadian Jewish Congress wade into policy issues and see the coverage that the battle for Jewish day school funds is getting in the media.

I doubt if there are any who want to go back to those "sha sha" days when Jews walked in fear of their shadows.

In those days, you could get a corn beef sandwich for 10 cents and a hot dog for five cents at any one of the delicatessens along College Street or Spadina Avenue. It is surprising how many of our people who served overseas yearned for those delicacies.

My first full-time job in 1938 was as a bookkeeper and gofer at Belmont Cloak and Suit in the Fashion Building on Spadina Avenue. I was paid the munificent sum of $6 a week, which included long telephone harangues in the evening from one of the partners.

I shot up to $8 a week in my next job as bookkeeper at Pearson Apple Company, which had unheated quarters in the old Esplanade market. But you were lucky to have a job in those days.

Irving's cross-examination 'surreal': expert witness

Robert Jan Van Pelt

He is a cultural historian (not an architect) and co-author with Debórah Dwork of the 1996 book Auschwitz, 1270 to the Present.

He wrote an even weightier tome on Auschwitz – a 772-page report, along with two supplementary reports – as evidence for the trial.

The issue of Auschwitz became the central point of contention at the trial. Van Pelt told The CJN.

"Irving was prepared to admit large-scale killings on the east front – these could be explained as killings done in the heat of war – but when you come to extermination camps like Auschwitz, you cannot explain this as part and parcel of the violence of a normal war situation."

In his cross-examination of Van Pelt, Irving – who served as his own lawyer – insisted that gas chambers at Auschwitz had no roof vents and thus could not have been used to kill inmates.

Van Pelt countered that argument, and similar ones, saying that evidence and testimony in the years since World War II made it a "moral certainty" that gas chambers were the main instruments of murder at Auschwitz between the summer of 1942 and fall of 1944.

'Moral certainty'

His report explains at some length the difference between "moral certainty" and other types of certainty. Moral certainty is based on quality of evidence and is the best certainty a historian can have, he said. "It's a very particular technical term."

As the first expert witness to be called, Van Pelt was cross-examined for a total of almost four days by Irving.

Unexpectedly, Van Pelt was compelled to declare his religion when the judge wrongly assumed the Bible on which Van Pelt would take his oath was a Dutch Protestant version. In fact, he used a German-Jewish prayerbook that has been in his family since the 1930s.

He was nervous, he admitted. Although Irving attempted to undermine his credibility by exposing him as a non-architect, Van Pelt realized after the first half dozen hours "he wasn't going to damage me, really."

In fact, one of Lipstadt's lawyers, Richard Rampton came to the same conclusion and on Jan. 26 (the second day of Van Pelt's cross-examination) penned an outline of a sinking S.S. Irving alongside a victorious HMS Van Pelt, which he later presented to Van Pelt.

The experience of being cross-examined by Irving was like a cat-and-mouse game, Van Pelt said. Irving's "traps, most of the time, don't appear to be much of a trap... You have this incredible tension... It becomes a kind of surreal situation."

On Yom HaShoah...

The recently concluded libel trial in London in which David Irving sued Deborah Lipstadt for having called him a Holocaust denier, reminds us like a hammer hitting our forehead that there are still people in the world who harbour evil intentions toward the Jewish people.

The presiding judge of the High Court, Charles Gray, did not equivocate in his findings concerning the plaintiff. He called Irving an anti-Semite and a racist, saying Irving had "portrayed Hitler in an unwarrantedly favourable light."

Time and again, whenever we read or hear of the Irving-like people, we shake our heads in anger. Disbelief is no longer appropriate. But the anger must lead to resolve that, collectively as a people, and as a society, we will always confront the deniers and the haters who come out from their hiding places to discredit Jewish history, belittle Jewish suffering and defame the Jewish people.

From the editor's desk

By contrast, however, to the appropriate societal response to the haters and the racists in our midst, there is always the dilemma of the appropriate individual response to "understanding" what happened in the middle of the last century.

Many people contend that silence and its companion, quiet reflection, may ultimately be the only private response possible in trying to "understand" or somehow "come to grips" with the Holocaust.

Next week, on the 27th day of Nisan, we must all try to at least think about the Holocaust in some form. The following two poems by Rabbi Louis Farrel and Miriam Weiner, may help us.

THE OATH OF THE HOLOCAUST

The Bible avows that the Creator
"Will avenge the blood of His Servants"
I vow to the last of my breath
Though man may forgive
And memories may fail
I vow to avenge their death
My oath I do seal on this wreath

May my right hand relax to my will
With a calm and a courage to kill
For the plunder and slaughter
For son and for daughter
For the cry that can never be still

May the curse that is theirs be their sons
May they die by their swords and their guns
May their rivers flow red
Their first born be dead
May they perish from earth like Huns

May the voice of the blood of the slain
Eternally brand them as Cain
May their numbers be few
And like the wandering Jew
May their cries from relief be in vain

Thus I wear as I stand by the grave
Of the ashes and bones of the brave
Of the mothers so loving
The children sweet
The fair maidens that no man would save

Of the mothers so loving
The children so sweet
The fair maidens that no man would save.

by Rabbi Louis Farrell

SURVIVORS

Their faces tell a story,
Their eyes speak loud, yet slow.
They tell about their memories,
From very long ago

And through the smile, a single tear,
Rolls down the aged cheek,
Recalling precious moments
Their lips now long to speak.

Once I was young and vibrant
I could do almost anything
Just like a brand new rose bud
I blossomed in the spring.

I had my moment in the sun
I laughed, I loved, I danced with joy
The world was at my beckoned call
I remembered those times, I remember them all.

But there were dark clouds.
And saddened days.
There were times when I was broken down,
In a sea of tears, where I'd almost drown.

The war tore apart
My heart and soul.
When it was over,
I was not whole.

But I fixed myself
And I smiled again.
There were so many joyous moments,
I remember when.

Come sit with me
I'll tell you more,
So many stories
Who's keeping score.

The years have flown,
The kids have grown,
And here I sit
So alone.

Bar-Ilan offers university courses on the Internet

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What can a staffer at the United States Embassy in Moscow, a university student in Mexico and a housewife in Thornhill possibly have in common?

They are all taking for-credit courses from Bar-Ilan University. And they don't even have to leave home to do it.

Bar-Ilan University, whose main campus is in Ramat Gan, Israel, now offers four credit courses through the Internet.

Former Torontonian David Schwartz, an Or Chaim graduate with degrees from University of Toronto and McMaster University, as well as a PhD from Case Western University in Cleveland, directs the project.

It all started from a desire by Prof. Moshe Kaveh, president of Bar-Ilan, who established the International Centre for Jewish Identity to "look at different ways to promote Jewish identity world-wide."

Kaveh wanted "to offer high level university courses for credit all over the world," Schwartz said.

Two and a half years ago, a conference at Harvard University predicted that within 10 or 15 years, because of changing technologies and the increasing use of the Internet, universities will become more specialized, Schwartz said.

For instance, a student could study Shakespeare from Oxford University, he said, or journalism from Columbia.

Similarly, Bar-Ilan would offer courses in Jewish studies.

And that is what they have been doing, with an enrolment of 450 people from 14 countries around the world, including Canada, Australia, France, Japan, Columbia, Switzerland, Mexico, and even in Israel itself.

Courses include Jewish Music in Traditional Culture and Society taught by Prof. Edwin Seroussi, head of the university's department of musicology; Jerusalem; War and Peace in the Bible; Laws of Family and Relationships; the Dead Sea Scrolls, and a course on the Jewish calendar.

Each course awards four credits. Tuition is $360 US per credit, although a course can be audited for $180 US. There are two semesters a year, February to May, and from October to January.

Schwartz explained that courses are taught by text, video and audio components. Once a week, the professor will participate in online chats, where the student can ask questions and talk about the course. "This is better pedagogically speaking, as well as more fun for everyone," Schwartz said.

Evaluation is by assignments, with essays submitted by e-mail and multiple choice quizzes.

There are both Hebrew and English language courses, he added.

One aspect of the program that Schwartz is particularly happy about is its intergenerational possibilities. "A parent or grandparent can take a course together with a child or grandchild, even if they live in a different place."

In some places, he said, there is a formal relationship with other universities, especially those with strong Jewish studies programs. Universidad Hebraica in Mexico, with 30 students enrolled in Bar-Ilan's course, is one such example. Four Canadian universities are also involved, Schwartz said, although he wouldn't name them during the interview.

Funding is through the International Centre for Jewish Identity, but the hope is that as the number of students increases, it will become self-supporting.

For more information, call Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, 905-660-3563, or e-mail dschwartz@bar-ilan.edu.

Concert celebrates choir's 75th anniversary

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Past, present and future will be reflected in the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir's upcoming 75th anniversary concert.

The concert will feature the Yiddish folk song, Rozhinkes Mit Mandlen (Raisins and Almonds) by Avrom Goldfaden; the premiere of Ben Steinberg's A Fist was Once an Open Palm, as well as other works.

Present day members of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir.

Ben Shek, 72, a retired professor who joined the choir in 1951, said that "countless songs belong to Goldfaden. But this song [Raisins and Almonds] is a lullaby which is so well known that it no longer belongs to him. It has become the possession of the people."

Goldfaden, who lived from 1840 to 1948, is considered the father of Yiddish theatre, Shek said.

"Goldfaden was a product of the Hascallah [Enlightenment] movement in Eastern Europe, and through his folk operettas and musicals, he brought the enlightenment to the shtetls of Europe."

The Goldfaden piece will feature soloists soprano Marina Shemesh and tenor John Botten. It will be narrated in English and in Yiddish by actor Paul Soles.

Soles, who co-hosted the show Take-30 with Adrienne Clarkson, will also narrate the work by Steinberg, which is based on the Hebrew poetry of Israeli poet, Yehuda Amichai.

The Amichai poem begins with the attachment of settlers to the land of Palestine, Shek said. It then moves to the War of Independence and the death of the poet's friend. It ends with a cry to the future, with appeals to stop the endless cycle of war.

Steinberg himself will conduct the music, Shek said, and it will be performed by the choir and the Trio Lyra – violist Mark Childs, harpist Erica Goodman and flutist Suzanne Shulman.

This concert commemorates the choir's founding 75 years ago by immigrant needle-trade workers.

When it began on D'Arcy Street, near King and Spadina, the choir was called Freiheit Gezangs Farein (Freedom Singing Society) and began performing annual spring concerts under conductor Hyman Riegelhaupt.

Rae Orlan, 80, sang with the choir until a few years ago.

"When I joined in 1939," Orlan said, "the choir was our life. Next to our family, the choir was our family."

Orlan began dating a tenor in the choir in the spring of 1940, whom she later married. "My husband and I ate, drank and slept choir," she said.

Shek, whose mother and father sang with the choir, said that beginning in 1939, under the leadership of conductor Emil Gartner, the choir did incredible things.

"During the '40s and '50s, the choir would fill Massey Hall, and we would sing with guest artists like Lois Marshall, Paul Robeson and Jan Peerce."

At that time, the repertoire expanded to include Canadian and international pieces. However, throughout its history, the choir has commemorated landmarks of the Jewish experience, with concerts marking events such as the Warsaw Uprising of World War II Poland, or the 500th anniversary of the Jewish expulsion from Spain.

"The choir has always tried to choose composers who reflect the cultural, socio-economic and political milieu of Jews of our times," Shek said. "But the music we have sung always features a popular Yiddish composer."

Tenor John Botten, 29, said when he began singing with the choir he didn't know Yiddish at all, "but I've learned how to read Yiddish and get the inflections," he said.

For its gala 75th anniversary, the choir will also perform Oscar Peterson's Hymn to Freedom, excerpts from Srul Irving Glick's Four Yiddish Songs accompanied by violist Mark Childs, and other Hebrew and international works.

The choir as it was in 1926.

Esther Ghan Firestone will conduct and Lina Zemelman will accompany on the piano. The concert takes place May 7, 3 p.m. at Temple Sinai Synagogue. Tickets are $18, $15 for students and seniors. For more information, call 416-489-7681.

Yom Hashoah

The teacher searched for a way to try to make comprehensible the incomprehensible, namely, the number 6,000,000. He asked his young students who were familiar with baseball and baseball stadiums to imagine the Skydome in Toronto or Olympic Stadium in Montreal filled to capacity, every seat occupied and then to imagine 20 such stadiums filled to capacity and placed side by side. Then his students would have an idea of the number – but not of the suffering – of the Jewish children murdered by the Nazis and their accomplices. If they then imagined 120 such stadiums occupied to their fullest capacity and placed side by side then his students would have an idea of the number – but not of the suffering – of all of the Jews – killed by the Nazis and their accomplices. Still, incomprehensible.

V'hagvurah

Resistance to the Nazis and their accomplices took many forms: active and passive, armed and unarmed, psychological and spiritual, religious and moral. The significance of the resistance is not to be measured in the results of the acts, very few of which, by any classic definition, could be considered to have been victorious, but rather by the very undertaking of the acts, all of which by all classic definitions, could be considered to have been heroic. For the generation that has not yet learned its words, and for the generation for whom its words have been seared into their hearts, we reproduce – as we did last year and as we have done in previous years – excerpts from the Jewish Partisan Song. Its message is the very embodiment of resistance to evil, courage in the face of overwhelming force, and the determination to affirm life in all its true goodness.

"…We'll have the morning sun to set our days aglow,
And all our yesterdays shall vanish with the foe.
And if the time is long before the sun appears,
Then let this song go like a signal through the years.

This song was written with our blood and not with lead;
It's not song that birds are singing over head,
It was a people, among toppling barricades,
That sang this song of ours with pistols and grenades.

So never say that there is only death for you.
Leaden skies may be concealing days of blue,
Yet the hour we have hungered for is near;
As we march, the earth shall tremble: We are here!"

Levant answers Csillag

Two weeks ago, Ron Csillag attempted to rebut an article that I wrote for the National Post, in which I criticized the Canadian Jewish Congress for campaigning against the recitation of the Lord's Prayer in public facilities.

I will ignore Csillag's personal attacks – he more or less implied that I was a disloyal Jew for daring to criticize the CJC. Actually, I made exactly the opposite point: By pursuing this campaign, the CJC itself is endangering the Jewish interest.

Here's how. The CJC is pressuring the Ontario government to ban Christian prayer at Queen's Park and town councils, and they applauded when Saskatchewan banned prayers in tax-funded schools, too.

This would be an appropriate campaign for the Canadian Atheist Congress, if such a group exists. But the CJC is supposed to be lobbying for Ontario to support prayer-based Jewish day schools.

The CJC has to make a decision: If it is for tax-funded prayer in Jewish day schools, how can it be against Christian prayer in tax-funded public facilities?

Doesn't the CJC understand the precedent it wants to set for Christians will be applied to Jews, too? It's like the CJC wants to take the Christmas lights down at City Hall, but still wants the big menorah lighting ceremony to continue.

A better approach would be the one the CJC used to take – promoting Jewish activities, not denigrating Christian ones. Instead of banning the Lord's Prayer in Queen's Park, for example, the CJC should be lobbying for the rights of Jewish MPPs to say their prayers, too.

Unfortunately, the CJC has forsaken its pro-Jewish past for an increasingly secular, multicultural and even anti-Christian future. Csillag claims that the CJC was never intended to promote Judaism, but was built to advance "human rights for Jews and other minorities." How banning anyone's prayers accomplishes this is a mystery, but in any event, that's not actually the CJC's mission.

The words "human rights" and "minorities" don't even appear in the CJC's charter. The CJC was built to help Jewish immigrants integrate into Canada, to fight anti-Semitism, and to recruit Jewish soldiers for World War II. If Samuel Bronfman ever intended for the CJC to become a replica of the federal Liberal party – mimicking their campaigns on gay rights, Aboriginal land claims and the firearms registry – he kept it a secret.

How much further into secular mush can things go, before the J in CJC becomes irrelevant?

The real cause of refugees' plight

The Pope is quite right in calling for an independent and hopefully democratic Palestinian state, and that will come to fruition as a result of the current Middle East peace talks. Reference is made to the Pope's visit to what is described as the squalid Dheisheh refugee camp set up in 1949 and home to 10,000 people, most of them Muslim. The plight of the refugees is indeed appalling, but the Pope, in referring to the implementation of United Nations Resolutions, implicitly blames Israel for their suffering. This is simply not true.

When Israel was invaded from all sides in 1948, the Arab invaders urged Palestinians to leave and promised that after Israel was driven into the sea, the Palestinians would be able to return to an Israel free of Jews.

From 1949 to 1967, the Dheisheh refugee camp and others were under the exclusive control of Jordan. That government did nothing to improve the horrific conditions under which the occupants of the camp were forced to live. After Israel acquired the West Bank following the 1967 war, the Arab states resisted any attempt to improve the camps, wishing them to remain an eyesore to embarrass the Israelis and to use the camps as a basis for the passage of a number of biased and racist resolutions passed by a United Nations hostile to the State of Israel.

Clearly, the Palestinian Authority in control of the area where the camp has been located for the past two years, has not lifted a finger to assist the refugees and again uses their existence and the suffering of the occupants as a bargaining chip in the ongoing Middle East negotiations. It is interesting to note that in all of the discussions about the refugees, nothing is said about the hundreds of thousands of Jews who were driven from Arab lands without compensation after the creation of the State of Israel. Pope John Paul correctly states that the Palestinian torment has gone on too long, but he fails to identify the perpetrators.

Chooses CTV over CBC

Re: "CBC Rejects Mideast item complaint" (CJN, March 30), it does not surprise us that Neil Macdonald's reporting was singled out as biased. However, it was easy for the CBC ombudsman to defend him by providing facts and dictionary definitions, and by finding balance allegedly provided in Joe Schlesinger's preface.

What is far more difficult to prove is our belief that Macdonald's reporting underlines an ongoing bias against Israel. It manifests itself regularly in his highlighting of certain events and his suppressing others. The Pope's visit was the latest example.

By way of contrast, we watched the report on CTV and thought we had witnessed two different events.

Macdonald might remember the fundamentals of CBC news and public affairs policy, instilled in every cub reporter from Day 1: fairness, accuracy and balance. Until they assign this important post to someone who remembers these fundamentals, we will choose other channels to receive our news.

Re-examining Holland's wartime record

By MANFRED GERSTENFELD

An overwhelmingly positive international image of the Dutch attitude toward the Jews during World War II has held sway for over 50 years. Visiting the Netherlands today, one finds many pleasant and helpful people there, which makes this reputation even more credible.

The Dutch wartime myth feeds primarily on the earlier part of the story of Anne Frank, a girl persecuted by bad Germans and protected by the good Dutch. The way in which she is remembered focuses on the courage of those who took risks to hide her. Nonetheless, her betrayal by Dutch people led directly to her death in the Bergen-Belsen camp, a few months before the Liberation.

It is true that there were resistance fighters, some of whom helped Jews, and that some other Dutch citizens also helped Jews. Such rare individuals merit in full the admiration erroneously heaped on the Dutch population in toto.

A school photo of Anne Frank in 1941, the year before she went into hiding. The author points out that "the Dutch wartime myth...feeds primarily on the story of Anne Frank." [AFF/AFS photo]

It is not widely known for instance that – relative to its population – the Netherlands had the highest number of Waffen SS volunteers in western Europe. They numbered about 25,000, and another 5,000 applied. The number of Dutch Nazi collaborators during the war exceeded the number of those active in the resistance.

It is not easy for foreigners to obtain information on what really happened to the Jews in the Netherlands as most of the detailed literature is in Dutch; however, the plain population figures are easily reached. The percentage of Jews from the Netherlands murdered during the war by the Germans and their associates was higher than in any other western European country. There were approximately 140,000 Jews in the Netherlands in 1939, representing 1.6 percent of the Dutch population; in Amsterdam they comprised as much as 9.5 percent of the city's population.

Some 107,000 Jews were deported from the Netherlands, of whom 102,000 were murdered. Most of the remainder went into hiding, were married to non-Jews and thus freed from deportation, or fled abroad. Fewer than 1,000 survived the war in Westerbork, the transit camp from which most Dutch Jews were sent to their deaths in the east.

Without even consulting her cabinet, Queen Wilhelmina fled to England before her country's capitulation five days after the German invasion in May 1940. Her government followed suit.

The Germans had initially intended to install a military government. In the legal vacuum thus created, Hitler imposed a civil Nazi government. He appointed the Austrian Nazi Dr. A. Seyss-Inquart as the highest civil government authority in the Netherlands.

Seyss-Inquart was accompanied by several other Austrians who later were to show their efficiency in administering the looting and deportation of the Jewish population.

In the early days of the occupation, the Germans ordered the removal of non-Aryans, i.e. Jews, from Dutch official life. The High Court of Justice, composed of prewar appointees, did not consider this a contradiction of the country's constitution. With this, they supported the removal from office of the Court president, the Jewish L.E. Visser.

Since the Netherlands was a well-administered and well-documented country, it was relatively easy to round up the Jews. The Germans could count on the full and sometimes zealous assistance of the Dutch administration in their preparation for the extermination of the Jews living in the Netherlands: this included identifying their victims, isolating them and looting their properties.

Referring to this Dutch collaboration with the Germans, one Dutch historian quotes Adolf Eichmann: "The transports run so smoothly that it is a pleasure to see."

The German-appointed head of the Amsterdam police, Sybren Tulp, had been a Dutch army officer. He wrote to the general commissary in charge of order and safety: "I can only declare that the young men of the new police battalion have done their job in the most remarkable way... Whenever they found more Jews at the marked addresses, they took all of them. But as, often, they found no Jews at all, they took Jews from the houses nearby, which made it possible that thousands and thousands of Jews have been sent without any tension from Amsterdam to Westerbork."

Well before the deportations, systematic looting of Jewish property and assets had begun upon German orders. Not all was on the initiative of the occupiers, however. The board of the Amsterdam stock market approached the German authorities and asked for permission to trade securities looted from the Jews. After the war, the Dutch prosecution decided not to press charges against the key figure in this endeavor, the German Otto Rebholz, writing: "others, purely Dutch financiers, did the same and traded at least 10 times more Jewish securities."

The phenomenon of Jews' being arrested, then temporarily released, and coming home to find all their possessions being stolen by other Dutch people was so common that the Jewish Council set up a special department for helping such victims. Many cases are known of Jews who hid their possessions during the war with non-Jewish acquaintances and neighbours, who then denied this when the Jews returned after the war. Even today, Jewish items, withheld since the war, are still sent anonymously to Dutch Jewish communities.

In the Netherlands, books and newspaper articles continue to report other stories which are further eroding the Dutch war myth. Wartime abuse and theft of property by the Dutch police are so frequent as motifs that this was clearly a matter of more than a few isolated cases.

In his book Servants of Authority, historian Guus Meershoek analyses the attitude of the Amsterdam police during the war. Among many examples of wrongful behaviour, he mentions how the Dutch police searched people in a Jewish café, confiscated their jewelry (which they noted in their records as found objects), and distributed them among themselves.

The government in London exile did not care much about the Jews either. In her radio speeches to the Dutch people during five years of exile, Queen Wilhelmina mentioned the suffering of her Jewish subjects only three times: twice in passing and once devoting three sentences to them. One might summarize this as one sentence per 20,000 Dutch Jews murdered.

A distorted image of the Dutch resistance was heavily propagated in the postwar era. It conveniently ignored the fact that the vast majority of the nation accommodated itself to circumstances.

The traumatized and impoverished remnants of the Jewish community were in no political or personal position to fight the many distortions of Dutch history. They had to build a new existence from scratch. To keep their sanity, they had to look to the future.

Some survivors were ill; others did not want to identify with the Jewish community. Furthermore, those who had been hidden during the war had mainly seen the better side of the Dutch nation. The majority, who had experienced a more representative truth, were no longer alive to tell their stories.

Even the current government upholds some of the historical distortions. A few months ago, via one of his senior officials, the Dutch minister of finance answered a letter from a Dutch survivor living in Israel: "On the question of guilt in regard to the fate of the Dutch Jews during the Holocaust, the Dutch government is of the firm belief that it has not forsaken its civic duties toward its Jewish citizens."

In early April, Dutch Prime Minister Willem Kok commented on Israeli radio: "The Dutch have never been responsible for the misbehaviour of the Germans in the Netherlands during the war." He made no reference whatsoever to the Dutch responsibility for the wartime misbehaviour of the Dutch authorities, institutions and many individuals to the Dutch Jews.

In light of the government's attitude, one can now better understand remarks made to a Dutch Jewish paper by Como van Hellenberg Hubar, ambassador of the Netherlands in Israel until this year. He argued that one should not destroy the myth of the "'good Dutchman.'

"The positive norm which this myth contains is part of the norms and values of the Netherlands. If one attacks the myth, then the danger exists that the norm, in this case tolerance, is also affected."

Dutch-born Holocaust psychologist Dr. Shai Schellekes, now living in Israel, comments: "From an educational point of view, it is much better to tell Dutch children that there is a choice between good and evil, while the collective is neither good or evil. The collective myth of the good Dutchman is only an educational hindrance."

At the 1998 Intergovernmental Conference in Washington on Holocaust Looting, a Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research was set up. The chair of the task force will be held by the Netherlands, starting from November 2000.

As long as the Netherlands, more than 50 years after the war, is unwilling to face its own past honestly, it doesn't seem very fit to lead international Holocaust education.

Manfred Gerstenfeld is an international business strategy consultant in Jerusalem and chair of the steering committee of the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs.

One thousand columns

In a few weeks I will be starting my 21st year of writing a weekly column for The Canadian Jewish News. I had contributed a fair number of articles before, but had to wait until I had finished with my term as president of the Canadian Jewish Congress (1977-80) in order to be free to write on any subject that crossed my mind, without such a column being construed as my speaking for Congress.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Now, having written about a thousand columns without missing a single issue, I am wondering just where the material came from. In fact, I am often asked where I gather ideas for a multitude of different subjects. Holiday time is as good an opportunity as any to reflect on this question.

First of all, I want to let my readers in on a secret: I do not write one column each week. Instead, I write four or five columns together for the weeks ahead and, of course, must make sure that the subject matter I discuss will not be overtaken by news occurring after I write the articles.

My subject matter is taken from many sources. First of all, I listen carefully to what people say in casual conversation, the opinions they express, the critique or endorsement of a particularly contentious matter. But above all, I draw on articles and books I read.

For many years, I have had the habit of subscribing to a wide variety of journals – some of which have names like The Utne Reader or Mother Jones. At least once or twice a week I take the time to look at the Israeli press that is published on the Internet and scan the daily offerings by such diverse organizations as the right-wing Arutz-Sheva and/or the opinions of the left-wing Tikkun. It is fascinating how the same subject can be treated so differently from two sides.

For whom do I write? I do not really know the profile of my readers. Perhaps a column is no different from a book: I write essentially for myself, to come to terms with something that has crossed my mind, that I have read, that pleases or bothers me. In that sense, a thousand columns are very much a photograph of my mind, and quite obviously, sometimes I write better or worse – depending on how much I am committed to the subject matter and how I feel at the time of writing.

So, I will keep on reading as widely as I can, and I hope you will continue to put up with me. That is the true reward of my efforts, as it is of any writer.

The legacy of the Pope's visit

The visit of Pope John Paul II last month was a historic triumph for Israel and the Jewish people. Indeed, it will take many years or generations before the full impact on Christian perceptions of Israel and on anti-Semitism can be fully understood. The images of the Pope – the leader of hundreds of millions of Catholics, and the most visible symbol of Christianity – at the Kotel, placing a request for forgiveness in the cracks, and at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial, will resonate for a long time.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

This papal visit stood in sharp contrast to the previous one in 1964.

Pope Paul VI spent only 12 hours in Israel. He refused to utter the name of the Jewish state or to acknowledge its legitimacy and was unwilling to meet the chief rabbis on the basis of equality. There was no discussion of anti-Semitism or complicity in the Holocaust.

To place the magnitude of the developments in the recent visit into context, it is important to recall that from the beginning of Christianity, the Jewish people and religion were considered to be enemy No. 1.

Christians held that the Jews were punished for rejecting and killing their messiah, and claimed that they had replaced the Jews as the chosen people. In this theological framework, the Jews, as a sign of disfavour, were forced to wander the earth, and the land of Israel was barren.

Christian hostility provided much of the foundation for anti-Semitism, justifying persecution and murder during the Crusades, the Inquisition, and the pogroms that ravaged European Jewry. The silence of the church and Pope Pius XII during the Holocaust is a major point of controversy and contention, as was tacitly acknowledged during the recent papal visit.

In light of this animosity, the changes in doctrine and policy under Pope John Paul II are truly remarkable. The process began in 1993, when the Vatican finally agreed to recognize the State of Israel. Although this was largely motivated by changing political and economic interests resulting from the Oslo agreement between Israel and the Palestinians, the theological aspects could not be ignored.

The Polish Pope, who grew up with Jews and lived through horrors of the Holocaust, has also led the Catholic Church in beginning to acknowledge its own sins and its role in anti-Semitism. A few days before coming to Israel, he led a special mass, introducing new rituals, and asking for forgiveness.

Although the text was couched in general terms, blaming individuals rather than the church and its teachings, this was a major step forward. At Yad Vashem and later at the Kotel, John Paul II reinforced these images, telling Catholics and Christians around the world that the changes in relations with the Jewish people and Israel were not merely temporary or tactical.

For its part, the Israeli government, led by Ehud Barak, and the religious leadership, also showed the ability to understand the importance of this moment. In sharp contrast to the Palestinians, who attempted to use the papal visit to spread hostile political and anti-Israeli propaganda, the Israelis, including the chief rabbis, acted with great dignity.

Some Palestinian-appointed Muslim clerics boycotted the interfaith meetings. They demonstrated their unchanging hatred of Israel, and repeated the offensive claims that the Jews exaggerated the Holocaust to gain sympathy. Later, Palestinians directed their hostility towards the Pope, which did not help them gain his support.

While Jews have a tendency to emphasize the dangers that lurk around every corner, this is one case where we can afford to be optimistic and congratulate our leaders on a job well done. It is true that the next pope might be more conservative, and attempt to reverse some of the recent progress in relations, but this would be difficult.

The image of the Pope at the Wall in Jerusalem, Judaism's most sacred site, asking for forgiveness, will not easily be erased. This was a victory of historic proportions, and proved, like the State of Israel and the thousands of Jews who participate in the March of the Living, that the Jewish people are alive – am Yisrael chai.

Playing monopoly with the public

Too bad for embattled Microsoft chair Bill Gates that he's not up against Israeli authorities instead of the U.S. Justice Department. Odds are that here in monopoly-friendlier Israel, he'd fare far better in defending himself against charges of anti-competitive practices.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

For decades, monopolies have reigned supreme in Israel. Much to the detriment of the public, Labour and Likud-led governments long perpetuated a system whereby one company or organization has exclusivity, from phone service to importing beef. Even today, despite an effort in recent years to loosen the grip of some monopolies, Israelis still pay a hefty price due to a state-sanctioned lack of competition in many sectors.

Things are a lot better now than they used to be but there's still a long way to go. A few weeks ago, the Knesset gave reason for hope when it approved the creation of a new television station. Until now, as the country's only commercial TV station, Channel 2 has had virtually a licence to print money.

By voting in favour of Channel 3, MKs scored a victory against the well-entrenched monopolistic forces in Israel.

Like most monopolies, Channel 2 has consistently abused its exclusive arrangement, laughing all the way to the bank. The public pays the price. As the only station allowed to sell advertising on television, Channel 2's owners milk the system, charging inflated ad rates to make the biggest profits in the shortest possible time.

It's not a pleasant sight. Never was the term "commercial break" more appropriate than on Channel 2. Frequent segments of 10 or more uninterrupted commercials, lasting six or seven minutes, literally break the flow of programs or films. Even in the big bad capitalist world of North America, broadcasters never unleash such a commercial assault on viewers.

Communications Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, who was a strong advocate of Channel 3, said it will bring long overdue competition to the TV industry and greatly increase the amount of local productions. The new station will likely hurt Channel 2's bottom line but it's hard to lose sleep for a company whose estimated profit this year is $130 million (US).

When it comes to cable TV, the public still has no choice. Ten years ago, the Knesset awarded licences to several cable firms, with each company winning a monopoly to provide services in its respective region. By default, consumers have been forced to hook up to the sole cable company in their area if they want to receive more than Channel 1 (the public network) or Channel 2. The result: Huge profits for the cable companies; poor product at exorbitant prices for the public.

But better days are ahead. This summer, after ripping off the public for years, the cable companies will finally face competition when the Yes company begins offering a DBS (Direct Broadcast Satellite) service, and not a moment too soon.

For far too long, Israeli consumers have been taken to the cleaners due to the government's over-regulation of the economy, especially its stifling of competition. But now there's no turning back. In the telecommunications sector for example, Israelis have seen the benefits derived from competition.

Until a few years ago, Bezek had a monopoly on all long distance phone calls for which Israelis paid a king's ransom. Sure enough, as soon as the government opened the sector to other companies, Bezek cut its rates drastically to compete with the new kids on the block. Alas, Bezek still has a monopoly on all domestic phone services – although its years are numbered.

The writing is on the wall for the country's other monopolistic behemoths, where bureaucratic inertia, excess layers of middle management, and a lack of accountability are endemic. If the interests of the public count for anything, the Knesset would end the monopolistic status of such privileged dinosaurs as the Israel Electric Company, the Oil Refineries, the Ports, and Egged Bus Company. The sooner the better.

And that goes too for the Chief Rabbinate, another corrupt monopoly whose Orthodox stranglehold on legally recognized Jewish religious matters is no less disturbing. But let's leave that one for another column.

The Kirshner File

Foreign workers - a problem for Israel

The neighbourhood around Tel Aviv's old central bus station, Neve Sha'anan, is shabby and noisy. It was in far worse condition when the buses were running regularly, the acrid exhaust from their diesel engines filling the grubby streets with a bluish cloud of pollution. Even now, Neve Sha'anan, its arteries invariably clogged with cars and its cavities filled with raucous fruit and vegetable vendors, is an eyesore, an affront to aesthetics.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

For the past few years, ramshackle Neve Sha'anan has also become synonymous with Israel's legion of legal and illegal foreign workers, the concept of which is an abomination to classic Labour Zionism.

Foreign workers, who constitute a budding social problem the Israeli government has only recently begun to recognize and counter, are an unmistakable presence in Israel as the new millennium begins. On a muggy Friday afternoon last July, when I was in Tel Aviv, they seemed to be everywhere, loitering on streets, nursing beers in dingy outdoor cafes, shopping at hole-in-the-wall discount stores, lining up to make long distance calls at international telephone centres, and frequenting massage parlors and strip joints.

Apart from an estimated 100,000 Palestinian Arab labourers, there are 75,000 legal foreign workers and from 65,000 to 100,000 illegal foreign workers in Israel today. They come from a variety of countries, Turkey, India and the Balkan states, but the majority hail from Thailand, Romania, Ukraine, the Phillipines, Ghana and Nigeria. They are largely employed in agriculture, construction and home and health care.

The director of the Ministry of Finance, Avi Ben Bassat, claims that Israel currently has the second highest percentage of foreign workers in the world after Switzerland in relation to its total work force. The figure is approximately 10 percent.

The foreign workers, especially the illegals, are a source of cheap labour for Israel's economy, which has slowed of late. In general, their wages are lower than even those of the Palestinians. But compared to their bleak prospects at home, the salaries they earn in Israel, usually $5 to $6 an hour (US), are relatively tolerable.

However, they pay a price for working in Israel, given the fact that the abuse of foreign workers has reached shameful proportions.

Workers legally in Israel often live in substandard housing, dozens crammed into small rooms with bunk beds, and often they are charged unconscionable rents.

Some employers illegally confiscate their passports when they arrive and withhold wages in the months before they return, virtually relegating them to the status of indentured servants.

As for illegal workers, they simply have no rights, according to Efraim Cohen, head of the Ministry of Labour's foreign workers department. In some cases, they are ruthlessly exploited.

The phenomenon of foreign workers in Israel, kibbutz volunteers notwithstanding, is a comparatively new one, dating back approximately to 1993.

There was an upsurge of terrorism beginning in the spring of that year. The Israeli government responded by sealing off the territories – the West Bank and the Gaza Strip – to Palestinian workers, who originally started streaming into Israel in the aftermath of the 1967 Six Day War. By 1987, when the intifadah broke out, upwards of 180,000 Palestinians were employed in Israel and in Jewish settlements in the territories.

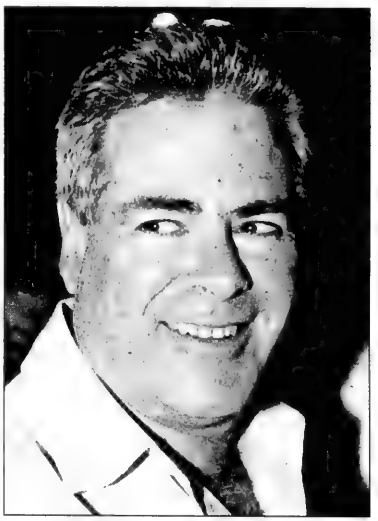
By one estimate, Israel was a major source of employment and income for more than a third of the Palestinian work force in the West Bank and Gaza.

But the blanket closures implemented by Yitzhak Rabin's government in 1993, which reduced the number of Palestinian workers to as low as 37,000 at one juncture, created a serious manpower shortage in Israel.

The Oslo peace process, which spawned unprecedented levels of terrorism, exacerbated the situation. In 1996, for example, the territories were closed off for over 100 days, causing havoc in the Israeli labour market.

As a result, Israeli employers sought to fill the vacuum. They turned increasingly to a more dependable supply of workers from abroad, workers over whom they had a measure of control. Private manpower agencies sprouted like weeds to fill the demand.

For a while, as long as the economy hummed along, the cure worked like a charm. The foreigners worked hard, they kept mainly to themselves, and they were not affected by the spate of Palestinian terrorism which convulsed Israel from 1993 onward.



Ephraim Sneh

But in the past four years, there has been a change of attitude on the part of Israel toward foreign workers, particularly illegals. From an existential point of view, some Israeli officials fear that foreign workers may somehow alter the basic Jewish character of the country. On a more immediate level, they contend that rising unemployment – which reached 8.9 percent in 1999 – cancels the need for such workers.

In 1996, when 250,000 foreign workers were supposedly in Israel, many of them illegally, the Israeli government began deporting illegals en masse, allocating more than $5 million for the deportation of 500 each month. Shortly afterward, Israel said it would not renew the expired work permits of 120,000 foreign workers.

This policy dovetailed with Israel's determination to hire yet more Palestinian workers so as to minimize the damage wreaked on the Palestinian economy by closures and by the wholesale expulsion of Palestinian workers from Kuwait and Saudi Arabia following the 1991 Gulf War.

In 1998, the former defence minister, Yitzhak Mordechai, eased closure rules. He decreed that Palestinian breadwinners older than 27 with clean security records, who had been employed for at least two years and were considered to be crucial members of the staff, would not be subjected to closures.

Last August, the deputy defence minister, Ephraim Sneh, increased the number of Palestinian labourers allowed into Israel, explaining that Israel had a vested interest in helping the Palestinian Authority achieve prosperity. As he put it, "As long as the economic situation (in the territories) is better, the willingness of the residents to carry out attacks will be reduced."

In the meantime, spurred on by the philosophy that Israel cannot afford a surfeit of foreign workers, the Israeli government is pressing ahead with deporting illegals, and considering the passage of legislation intended to increase the cost of employing foreigners.

Eli Yishai, the former minister of labour and social affairs, did not mince words when he said that "the effect of foreign workers on Israeli society is deadly." Moshe Dimri, the director general of the Employment Service, has likened the influx of foreign workers into Israel with the inflow of Turkish guest workers into Germany. He warned: "I fear that in another 10 years we'll see one million foreign workers in Israel. They will bring their wives, and their children will be born here. Israelis are becoming alienated from and resentful of the foreign workers."

Eric Cohen, a Hebrew University sociologist, does not believe that any of the groups of foreign workers in Israel have hardened into permanent ethnic communities. But at a public seminar organized by the Harvey Silbert Centre for Israel Studies, he warned that the situation could easily change if current trends remain unchecked.

Jewish Life

Memory and history

By RABBI REUBEN POUPKO

Rabbinic Reflections

As Chaim Yerushalmi taught in his slim yet monumental work, Zakhor, memory is not synonymous with history. Memory springs from collective consciousness, and not only concerns itself with the factual substance of the past, but is also informed by intuitive decisions made by history's heroes and victims about how to frame, contextualize and learn from that past.

A people's character is determined not only by what they have done or what was done to them, but also by the lessons they decide to learn from those events. There is an often painful debate concerning the uses and abuses of Holocaust memory. Thinkers, distinguished and not so distinguished, have written and spoken from their own perspective on this issue.

Some, like Peter Novick, author of The Holocaust in American Life, have ascribed near conspiratorial deliberateness to "Jewish leadership" in their effort to manipulate "Jewish masses" into adopting specific political positions.

To accept his view is to defame Jewish leadership, insult the intelligence of "Jewish masses," and believe that one can actually deliberately influence the effect of an event so powerful as to defy normative categories. The Jewish people are not easily duped; nor can the Holocaust, which echoes with such tangible resonance, be easily distorted. The Jewish people learned a long time ago that certain questions will never be answered, but that other questions almost answer themselves.

Why we suffer is often beyond comprehension, but what we learn from that suffering is probably the most durable Jewish lesson. While the Torah never explains why we were slaves in Egypt, it repeatedly tells us how to behave because we were slaves. Be kind to the stranger because you know the spirit of the oppressed – this is the single most repeated biblical directive. Suffering should engender empathy. It is not a reason to suffer, but it is suffering's loftiest teaching.

The past half-century has proven that the Jewish people know this well. Whether the response was to Jewish suffering or the pain of others, we have always been there. The Holocaust has refined our moral antennae as we respond quickly to our own causes of distressed Jewish communities and to the universal cause of human rights. The Holocaust should have taught all the painful price of silence in the face of injustice, but we as a collective have certainly demonstrated that we have learned from yesterday's moral failings.

Rabbi Poupko is the spiritual leader of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation in Montreal.

God and suffering

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The modern French philosopher Albert Camus, in his book The Rebel, writes that "the only thing that gives meaning to human protest is the idea of a personal God who has created and is therefore responsible for everything. Only a personal God can be asked by the rebel for a personal accounting."

Nowhere is this idea truer than in talking about the Shoah. Seen from a secular perspective, the Holocaust raises issues of human brutality and global anti-Semitism. But viewed from the point of view of religious faith, Auschwitz echoes with the awful silence of God.

One of the most remarkable responses to this silence was the emphasis, by one of Nazism's victims, on an ancient Jewish poetic idea – that God actually suffers with His people. The image of divine tears is expressed in a tremendously moving way by Rabbi Klonymous Kalman Shapira, the rabbi of the Warsaw Ghetto until the Nazis killed him in 1943.

Rabbi Shapira's writings were buried in the ground and only uncovered after the war, when they were published under the title, Aish Kodesh, the Holy Fire. Rabbi Shapira's viewpoint is a mystical one. He makes the case that there is a secret realm in the heavens where God retreats to mourn for Jewry, where Hashem privately weeps.

Originally adhering to a steadfast belief that God's actions would prove discernible and just, Rabbi Shapira's perspective continued to evolve as the war continued. As Nehemia Polen notes in this book, The Holy Fire: "The notion of suffering as punishment for sin invokes a calculus of rationality. There is an arithmetic balance, a measured correction between sin and its consequences. But as the war progressed and the horrors increased, the calculus became more and more difficult to maintain, and Rabbi Shapira set it aside. The crisis had become so extreme that any systematic understanding of God's ways was rendered impossible. Faith that God would intervene to save the Jews was transformed into faith in God despite the evidence that He had not intervened to save the Jews. The rational accounting of reward and chastisement was replaced by the mythic and participatory consciousness of divine weeping."

Is God crying for man a comforting reaffirmation of presence or a painful reminder of absence? The impact of human suffering on the educator's ability to convince students of the idea of loving God is complex and considerable.

But perhaps the first step is not to deny the dilemma and pretend that theology can easily explain or disarm those perplexed by the enormous pain in a world which God created.

As Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik so graphically expresses it, "evil is an undeniable fact. There is evil, there is suffering, there are hellish torments in this world. Whoever wishes to delude himself by diverting his attention from the deep fissure in reality, by romanticizing human existence, is nought but a fool and a fantast."

On this Yom Hashoah, may the words and deeds of each Jew begin to help close that fissure and mend the world.

Mimouna on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Immediately after the close of Passover, Sephardi Jews from Morocco celebrate a beautiful tradition. They bid farewell to Passover and usher in Mimouna, a celebration of liberty, community values, friendship and togetherness, and an extraordinary show of hospitality. Today, a look at Mimouna on the World Wide Web.

The SephardiConnection Web site describes it this way: In marked contrast with the seder night, when congregants hurry home from the synagogue to begin the Haggadah, congregants on Mimouna eve take the time to greet each other at the evening service with the consecrated formula: tarbah (success); the special Mimouna blessing: Alallah Mimouna, Ambarka mas'uda. They drink a little mahya and stop on their way home to visit the rabbi's family, the chazzan, their own parents, their friends and their neighbours, in that order [http://sephardiconnect.com/pesah/mimouna.htm].

What about the origin of the name Mimouna? According to the Orthodox Union site, it contains the word Emunah, faith, and its celebration can be traced to the anniversary of the death of Rav Maimon, the father of Maimonides [http://www.ou.org/chagim/mimouna.htm].

One of the loveliest descriptions of the day is from the Jerusalem Institute of Technology's Hebrew language site Mimouna Night at Badbedo [http://www.jct.ac.il/judaica/marocco/mimouna.html]. In Badbedo, Morocco, the woman of the house would spread out a white tablecloth, light holiday candles and adorn the table with fresh beans, a plate of flour, milk, butter, sweet, dried fruit and muffleta, a crepe eaten with butter and honey in the centre. The husband would return from synagogue and wish everyone "success, luck and happiness."

They would chant sections from Proverbs. The husband and wife would offer each other and their family dates filled with an almond dipped in butter and honey as a way to wish a blessed New Year. (You need to have Hebrew fonts installed in order to read this Web site.)

Traditionally, early the following morning, families in coastal cities get up and head for the seashore. They splash their faces with water, and step barefoot into the ocean – to replay, in a sense, the miraculous crossing of the Red Sea.

But in Israel, Mimouna has transcended its religious roots and emerged as a prime political event. According to an article in Ha'aretz, 30 years ago a Labour politician started the tradition of turning the traditional house parties into gatherings for "all the people of Israel." [http://www.gsnonweb.com/gsnlib_a/gsn1999/99_04/990408/39198.html]

Since then it has mushroomed as a day for politicians to be seen. Officials made appearances, helicoptered from event to event to score points. But lately, the public has become jaded. "Once, when a prime minister would come, we'd feel he was bringing honour to the Moroccans. Now, we know they come for themselves, not for us."

The preferable way to spend the day is at family picnics, where tents are pitched in recognition of the biblical phrase, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob."

What do you pack for the picnic? If your mother never taught you any Mimouna recipes, you can find some at [http://www.google.com/search?q=cache:www.kfar-olami.org. il/english/resources/landmark/aliyah/MIMOUNA.htm]. Couscous Hiloo is very sweet. It calls for couscous, sugar, cinnamon, raisins, dates, apricots, almonds and almond milk. And for something pungent, try the Moroccan Carrot Salad which has carrots, garlic, paprika, hot pepper, lemon juice and olive oil.

Enjoy and have a very Happy Mimouna.

Fundamentalism examined

The Battle For God*, by Karen Armstrong (Random House)

Books
Bernard Baskin

Karen Armstrong's A History of God (1993) was an impressive work and justly acclaimed – an informative and accessible study of the three great western monotheistic religions – Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

Now, in an equally illuminating and perceptive book, she focuses on the fundamentalist tendencies and practices among American Protestants, haredi Israeli Jews, Shiite Muslims in Iran and Sunni Muslims in Egypt. She outlines the growth of modernist thinking and scientific rationalism, beginning in the 16th century, and the inevitable negative reaction of traditional religionists eager to retain their literal interpretation of scripture and their adherence to revealed doctrine.

In the late 1980s, a group of Israeli zealots plotted to destroy the Dome of the Rock, the Muslim shrine on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. They believed that if they took the first step, God would certainly reward this act of faith by intervening in history, sending the long-awaited Messiah and redeeming the people of Israel.

Not only would the bombing of the Dome of the Rock have ended the peace process, it would almost certainly have resulted in a war in which, for the first time, the whole Muslim world would have joined forces against Israel.

In 1981, Sunni extremists assassinated President Anwar al-Sadat of Egypt. They argued that every true Muslim must take part in a holy war against Sadat's impious regime. An Islamic state would never be established by peaceful non-violent means.

In the United States, religious fundamentalists are more restrained and law-abiding. They do not assassinate their presidents, lead revolutions or take hostages. But polls show the religious population of the United States to be neatly divided into two almost equal and mutually antagonistic camps.

Mainstream Christian coalition leaders offer what is relatively speaking a moderate version of jihad – a holy war against secularism. Jerry Falwell, the leader of Moral Majority, sermonizes against a Supreme Court that has "raped the Constitution and raped the Christian faith and raped the churches" and implores followers to "fight against those radical minorities who are trying to remove God from our textbooks. We must take back what is rightfully ours."

Armstrong writes: "These Christian soldiers bring to their ardent campaign against time and the modern world all the indignation, all the impatience with moral slackness, all the purifying hatred, of the zealous in Tehran and Cairo."

In a concluding chapter the author argues that for a variety of reasons – globalization and technology, as well as such local factors as internal corruption among American fundamentalists and the desire of Iranians for a more moderate Islam than Ayatollah Khomeini and his successors were offering – the fundamentalists phenomenon may have peaked during the 1980s and early 1990s.

When all is said and done, Armstrong believes that fundamentalists must develop a more compassionate assessment of their enemies in order to be true to their religious traditions. At the same time, secularists must also be more faithful to the benevolence, tolerance and respect for humanity, which characterizes modern culture at its best.

The author, who spent seven years as a Roman Catholic nun, now teaches at the Leo Baeck College in England. She is widely regarded as one of the most astute and knowledgeable of modern religious commentators.

Celebrating Passover in Iran

By SHAHNAZ KEYPOUR
Special to The CJN

Passover usually occurs during or after the Iranian New Year called Norooz – depending on whether it is a Jewish leap year or not.

Norooz celebrates the precise arrival of the moment when the sun crosses the equator, signifying that winter has ended and spring has begun.

Feature

In Iran, Pesach is called Chag Aviv or the Festival of Spring. The weather is mild with the sun shining in a blue sky every day. The fruit trees are in bloom and there is a general feeling of festivity everywhere you go.

Iranians, to this day, clean and arrange their homes for the arrival of the New Year as we Jews do before Passover with Pesach cleaning.

Iranian Jews, like other Jews, are forbidden to eat leavened bread during Pesach. But while Ashkenazi Jews must also abstain from rice during Pesach, Iranian Jews may continue to eat it. This is because rice in Iran is regarded as a staple food, rather than a grain.

This use of rice and other traditional Iranian dishes served during Pesach are ways in which the traditions vary slightly from the Ashkenazi practices during the festival.

The rituals and the symbolic foods found on the seder plate differ only slightly in the two traditions. The seder plate contains celery, lettuce, salt water, a shank bone, bitter herbs and burnt egg, in both traditions.

The charoset, however, is different. The Iranian version contains nuts (such as almonds, walnuts, pistachios, and hazelnuts) and fruits (such as apples and grapes) all combined with pomegranate juice and wine to produce a delicious paste. There is also wine, matzah and a large platter of green onions on the seder table.

The green onions are one of my fondest memories of seder nights. When we chant Dayenu, we whip each other with the green onions to remind us that our forefathers were beaten by the Egyptians' whips. It is quite a sight and lots of fun! Ashkenazi friends, who have been to our home for seders, enjoy this part of our tradition.

When I was a child in Iran, we still maintained our traditional way of life by gathering around a ceremonial cloth called a sofreh. The sofreh, which was decorated with silver thread, was set up in the middle of our Persian carpet on the floor and the seder food was displayed on it.

As we went through the Haggadah according to the order of the seder, we would sing the songs to Persian tunes. A variety of Persian dishes made up the seder meal.

Since rice is the foundation of many Persian dishes, we eat it for lunch and dinner, as well as for some breakfasts during Pesach. When Persian rice is served with chicken, meat or fish, it is flavoured with lots of onion and garlic, fresh herbs, vegetables, dried fruits, nuts, and a mixture of Persian spices including saffron, cardamom, cumin, turmeric and cinnamon.

The result is a healthy and uniquely Persian dish that can be as colourful as a Persian miniature, and as exotic as a poem by Omar Khayam.

Following the two seder nights, the celebrations continue for the remainder of Pesach. Adopting a pre-Islamic tradition, it is customary for the younger members of the family to visit their older relatives and friends during Pesach in order to show their respect for them. Delicious food and drinks are served to the visitors.

Shabeh Sal, the celebration marking the end of Pesach, takes place in the home of the eldest member of the family. Visitors bring trays of sweets with them. For this occasion, dairy dishes are prepared to signify the end of Pesach, since no kosher l'Pesach milk or milk products are available.

No Persian event is complete without the tea drinking ceremony. During Passover, tea is served with dates rather than sugar, as kosher l'Pesach sugar is also not available.

The next day, the entire Jewish community leaves home to picnic in a cool, grassy place. This day is called Roozeh Sal and is another pre-Islamic custom that the Jews have adopted.

Iran is a country full of traditions. These traditions stay with us and we hope to pass them on to our children. When I prepare Iranian food at home, when the air is filled with the aroma of basil, tarragon, parsley, coriander, cumin, saffron, cardamom, cumin and mint, lots of fond memories come back to me.

I wish a speedy geula (redemption) for our Iranian fellows kept unjustly imprisoned in Shiraz.

Time Changes Nothing

That was then...

The little boy sat on a chair taking in the sights and sounds and smells as the kitchen was magically transformed.

He knew it was a special time, a holiday time.

At the other end of the room, his mother scurried here and there, never stopping, never slowing down.

There came a question from behind her.

She stopped, turned around and gazed lovingly at her son.

"You love all this," she said.

The boy just smiled and said it was the best.

This is now...

The man maintained his hurried pace as he dashed around the kitchen cleaning here, preparing there. It was a hectic time, a busy time.

There came a question from behind him.

Turning, he saw his daughter sitting on a chair taking in the sights and sounds and smells.

"Why do you love all this," he said.

The girl just smiled, shrugged her shoulders and said it was the best.

Time stopped. Everything became clear.

He gazed lovingly at her, smiled and remembered...and understood.

Time had really changed nothing.

JF&CS program to aid teens with eating disorders

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Next month, Jewish Family & Child Service is introducing a program which will take a unique approach to helping parents and adolescents with eating problems.

The eight-week program covers a different topic each week based on a manual called Why Weight? A Psycho-educational Program For Teens With Eating Disorders and Their Families, written by four professionals including Leora Pinhas, a psychiatrist and director of the eating disorder treatment program at York County Hospital in Newmarket and Jill Fraleigh, a clinical dietitian at the hospital.

While this is the first time JF&CS has run the program, it is not new. York County Hospital has run the program for three years and North York General Hospital has run it for one year. The program has also been run by professionals across Ontario.

JF&CS realized the need for a program when its social work staff, who work in Jewish day schools and public schools with large concentrations of Jewish students, "were encountering more and more young people with eating disorders and feeling we had to respond as a community," said Pat Lieberman, co-ordinator of the Jewish Family Life Education Program at JF&CS.

In the last five years, Pinhas has also noticed an increase in Jewish teenagers coming to the eating disorder program at York regional hospital.

"My sense is the rates of disordered eating and eating disorders are going up," she said.

"More and more kids are going on diets ... are having chaotic eating patterns."

She attributes this to the pressure placed on teens to be thin and people treating thin teens and obese teens differently.

In the Orthodox community, when young people are being matched, there is sometimes a weight requirement, Pinhas said.

But she emphasized that she sees teens from all sectors of Judaism and has not noticed a concentration among one particular denomination.

While many programs have been developed for adults, Why Weight? is specifically designed for adolescents aged 13 to 18.

"Our hope is that if we can get the kids when they are young, they will not turn into adults with eating disorders," Fraleigh said.

Most people with eating disorders develop the illness as adolescents and evidence shows the longer you have the eating disorder, the harder it is to recover from it, she said.

A unique feature about the program is it "provides support for people at all different levels of readiness," Fraleigh said.

Many programs assume that because a person has been diagnosed with an eating disorder, he or she is automatically ready to do something about it. Why Weight? acknowledges that there are various stages a person goes through before they are ready to change, she said.

Acknowledging which stage a person is at is important, Pinhas said.

If you expect someone to act on the problem when they are only just contemplating having a problem, "then all you set yourself up for is failure and conflict," she said.

Parents and teens are educated together for the first hour of each weekly two-hour session and are separated during the second hour.

Teenagers who have participated in the program said they benefited from peer support and knowing they were not alone gave them hope for recovery, Fraleigh said.

Parents benefit by receiving support from other parents and learning about the process of recovery – which brings a heightened understanding to the "why doesn't she just stop?" type of thinking, Fraleigh said.

In the program, parents learn about their role in supporting their son or daughter's recovery.

Involving parents in the program is an important part of this model, according to a 1999 York County Hospital write-up of the program.

"We have often seen parents whose daughters or sons have been involved with several other professionals without their [parents] ever having been included in the process or given a basic understanding of eating disorders and their role in the recovery process," the write-up stated.

For more information on the program, call Pat Lieberman at JF&CS 416-638-7800 ext. 215.

Rally planned to support Iran 13

TORONTO — A community rally in support of the 13 Jews who face trial in Iran on charges of spying for Israel will be held April 30 at 4 p.m. in Earl Bales Park.

The rally is sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress (Ontario region) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The trial of the so-called Iran 13 was supposed to have taken place this month. It's been rescheduled for May 1.

The 13 face the death penalty if convicted. Only three have been granted bail. The rest have languished in jail for 13 months since their arrest.

Community leaders are expected to address the rally. Similar vigils are taking place in other cities.

For details, call 416-635-2883.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Takes Off

The launch of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow at the historic Kiever Synagogue featured Mayor Mel Lastman and nearly 300 community visionaries. JTT is the most ambitious initiative in the history of Toronto's Jewish community. It includes new community partnerships, an innovative approach to philanthropy and a massive development program. For more information check out the JTT website www.jewishtorontotomorrow.net.

Allow Us to Introduce Toronto's Dream Team.

These young people are what nearly 200,000 Toronto Jewish community members are dreaming about. Dressed as their favourite Purim heroes and heroines, they are the inheritors of our dreams. And the creators of new ones.

They're dreaming of a caring community, which will compassionately meet their needs and those of others. They're dreaming of an inspired community which will be guided by Jewish values. And they're dreaming of an inclusive community which will be responsible for all Jews everywhere.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) is our opportunity to make their dreams come true.

JTT combines our community's largest development program with a dynamic partnership plan which has already brought donors and dozens of Jewish organizations together to serve the community.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is developing powerful partnerships to create new facilities and services for Jews living downtown, in the central Bathurst-Sheppard corridor, north of Steeles and even in Israel's Eilat-Elot region.

In the last two decades our community has changed in extraordinary ways. But the dreams of our children remain the same. They're the dreams of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow.

Holocaust denial's a tool for pseudo-intellectuals

By ALAN SCHWARTZ
Jewish Family & Life!

The SS guard took pleasure in telling us that we had no chance of coming out alive .. insisting that after the war the rest of the world would not believe what happened; there would be rumours, speculations, but no clear evidence, and people would conclude that evil on such a scale was just not possible.

– A survivor of Dachau quoted in The Survivor by Terrence Des Pres.

Today's anti-Semites manipulate the almost unimaginable history of the Holocaust to deny the very events that made it the cataclysm that it was. Holocaust denial is the latest weapon in the arsenal of contemporary anti-Semites. And since it first began crawling out of the propaganda woodwork a generation ago, Holocaust denial has grown more sophisticated – if no less cynical and calculating – over the years.

Yom Hashoah Feature

The Nazis themselves originated the idea of Holocaust denial, by perfecting the "Big Lie" technique. The very term "Final Solution" along with such deadly euphemisms as "resettlement" and the infamous Arbeit Macht Frei (Work Sets You Free) over the entrance to Auschwitz reflected the Third Reich's recognition that deception and denial were valuable tools in deterring detection of their plans and actions (although they counted on and benefited from the outside world's wilful blindness as well).

Yet the Nazis' own meticulous, indeed virtually obsessive, documentation and the many detailed confessions at Nuremberg established an evidentiary record of the regime's genocide as unique in history as the Holocaust itself – one which could justifiably have been presumed denial-proof. But never underestimate the resourcefulness, cynicism and blatant chutzpah of the anti-Semite.

One of the earliest Holocaust denial books in the United States was The Hoax of the 20th Century by Arthur Butz, a professor of electrical engineering at Northwestern University. This 1970s-vintage piece of brazen mendacity illustrates several abiding characteristics of the genre: (1) it claims a certain intellectual legitimacy for itself in that it was written by someone with a PhD (albeit in a field far removed from historical or political expertise), in a tone of academic "objectivity," potentially persuasive to the uninformed; (2) despite its scholarly pretensions, it is largely an extended vehicle for familiar anti-Semitic conspiracy theory – i.e., the Holocaust is an elaborate "hoax" perpetrated by Jews and Zionists to dupe the unsuspecting into sympathizing with victimized Jews and supporting the State of Israel, which is built on western guilt; (3) it offers elaborate, contorted explanations "debunking the hoax," including the claim that horrific death-camp photos were doctored, that postwar Jewish population figures were manipulated and falsified, and that scientific fact and experimentation belie official accounts of Nazi mass killing techniques; and (4) the book and dozens like it over the years have become standard fare offered in neo-Nazi and other hate group book lists, reflecting how readily such propaganda has provided new avenues of exposure and permutation for "traditional" anti-Semites and their themes.

In recent times the most significant source of this pseudo-intellectual sludge has been the innocuous-sounding Institute for Historical Review (IHR), a California-based brainchild of Willis Carto, who since the 1950s has been a leading anti-Semitic polemicist and founder of Liberty Lobby, long the most influential anti-Jewish far-right propaganda organization in the country.

IHR's meetings and publications featuring the work of "revisionists" have been promoted in Liberty Lobby's weekly tabloid, Spotlight, which also touted the group's infamous "reward" offer of $50,000 to anyone who could "prove" that Nazi gassings took place at Auschwitz.

Denying the Holocaust is the pseudo-intellectual's anti-Semitism

But that ploy backfired when Holocaust survivor Mel Mermelstein successfully took up the cruel challenge and won a judgment for the full amount from a California court that accepted the evidence of his personal experience with the Nazi killing machine, and took "judicial notice" of the reality of the Holocaust.

That decision surely represented justice, both poetic and literal, but troubling questions haunt: Do the deniers achieve success, despite their pecuniary penalty, by placing the facts of the Shoah – the Holocaust – in the arena of judicial debate? And is the truth of the horrors to be made dependent on whether they are verified and validated by this or that court?

Such dilemmas will only proliferate as the passage of time takes the survivor generation from our midst, leaving it only to us and our successors to provide life support to memory, and to meet the multiple challenges of ignorance, apathy – and the Internet.

The haters themselves never imagined when they set to work in earnest, only a couple of decades ago, that the ingenuity and pace of rampaging technology would provide them, as well as us, with the capacity to reach and influence millions of people as never before: instantly, cheaply, anonymously, respectably.

While IHR has lost staff and steam since a 1993 feud between Carto and its other activists, the group has had an active Web site. One of IHR's leading activists Bradley Smith also has a Web page featuring related links.

Smith's claim to infamy is his ongoing effort to place ads denying the Holocaust (or denouncing the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.) in college newspapers around the country, in the interest of "open debate."

Other dedicated sources of hate like the National Alliance, the virulently anti-Semitic and growing organization headed by another "academic" bigot, William Pierce, PhD and author of The Turner Diaries, a blueprint for bloody racial revolution which reportedly influenced Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh, have also actively taken up Holocaust-denial.

Another important Holocaust-denying denizen of the Web is Ernst Zundel of Canada, author of The Hitler We Loved and Why, whose site is both extensive and frequently updated in several languages.

One further troubling note about the Internet: Because of the freewheeling nature of search engines, a student using the keyword Holocaust may well find the above garbage listed along with the many legitimate, scholarly sites on the subject. Thus does cyberspace afford the deniers unwarranted mainstream respectability.

On the other hand, the recently concluded London libel case brought and lost by British writer David Irving is a success story of impressive proportions – not only for Professor Deborah Lipstadt of Emory University, whose description of Irving in her 1993 book Denying the Holocaust as a "Hitler partisan," an anti-Semite and "one of the most dangerous spokespersons for Holocaust denial" was upheld as "substantially accurate" by Justice Charles Gray. It was also a victory for truth, indeed for the very concept of historical fact.

The case is a landmark along the dreary road of pro-Hitler "revisionism." The matter has received such intense media attention – front-page coverage, editorials and op-ed pieces in print, online and in news services – largely because of Irving's former legitimacy as a popular writer on military matters.

The case has brought the troubling reality of this phenomenon to the broad general public, who might otherwise never have confronted it or considered its implications. Perhaps even more important, in an age of widespread relativism (i.e., One person's terrorist is another person's freedom fighter) and the pervasive popularity of the anarchic notion of "deconstruction" in academic circles – both over-intellectualized ways of avoiding meaning and abdicating responsibility for preserving it – the judge's findings are a hopeful sign that clear thinking, logical reasoning and fidelity to facts remain high on the civilized world's agenda.

Despite the fears of some, the Holocaust itself was not on trial in London; it was whether Lipstadt's characterizations were justified. Judge Gray found they were, ruling that Irving "deliberately misrepresented and manipulated historical evidence." One must take the idea of historical evidence seriously to reach such a conclusion. That is crucial – and, unfortunately, noteworthy.

The Irving verdict is in. The verdict of history and the survival of history as a discipline demanding intellectual rigor and honesty are not as certain. The answer to this question may depend on how well the Holocaust and its lessons are remembered.

Some personal thoughts on a bygone era

The proprietors, Archie Pearson and his father, were always fair with me.

But it was here that I had my first joust with the real world when a buyer for the firm absconded with cheques that I had prepared, instead of paying for tomatoes from Leamington growers which were to be sold at the Pearson stand.

During the mid and late '30s, our family lived in rented homes on Bellwoods Avenue (now a Ukrainian church school) near Queen Street, on Dundas Street West, and on Roxton Road, near Dundas.

In those days, we rented out the second floor, or flat, which usually had a sink, to help pay the rent. We were not above scouring for coke (a residue left after the combustion of petrol) at Consumers Gas at $1 a bag, which was cheaper than the price of coal.

My late brother Maurice and my late sister Lillian were both working at low-paying jobs so it was with gleeful anticipation that I received a telegram from the Department of National Defence in September of 1939 asking me to report to Ottawa as a patriotic duty.

Canada had declared war on Germany a few days earlier.

I was to be paid $720 a year as a clerk-typist, but when I reported, it was to the Port of Ottawa – National Revenue. I wasn't sent to National Defence, despite the patriotic come-on in the wire.

Eventually, I found my way back to Toronto as a reporter for the Toronto Star at the beginning of 1944, where I continued to work until 1965.

This gave me an opportunity to play tennis again, this time at the old Hudson Tennis Club on Dovercourt Road, just below College Street, where a public school is now located.

It was the only Jewish tennis club in the city and I was glad to play there, particularly since I had been blackballed when trying to join the club at Hanlan's Point and at the Toronto Tennis Club on Price Street.

These are just some personal thoughts on a bygone era.

Just Between Us

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

כל שנה, עם סיום הסדר כהילכתו, אני מוצא את עצמי יושב וחושב איך איך איך. איך יתכן שכל כך הרבה אנשים חילוניים, שלא פתחו סידור מאז הבר מצווה, או הבר מצווה של הבן, יושבים פעם בשנה ובמשך כמה שעות ממלמלים מלים בארמית שאין להם מושג קלוש מה הן אומרות, וממלמלים מלים בעברית תנכית שגם אותה הם בקושי מבינים. ואיך זה שלמרות שלקראת סוף הערב כולם כבר מקטרים בשקט ואין להם סבלנות, הם מחכים בכליון עיניים לשנה הבאה לחוור על זה מילה במילה.

ההסבר לא יכול להיות פשוט, וכמובן שמה שיש לי להגיד בעניין הזה לא בהכרח תורה מסיני. אני אישית מאמין שלכולנו יש באיזה שהוא מקום כמיהה למסורת, משהו שורשי וחוק להיות שייכים אליו. בגלל שרבים מאיתנו גדלו במדינה חילונית עם אנטגוניזם לכל מה שהוא דתי, הפסדנו המון. ובגלל שאנחנו בעלי ביטחון עצמי ושקפת עולם מגובשת, אנחנו לא מרשים לעצמנו להודות כמה הפסדנו וכמה אנחנו מתגעגעים למה שלא קיבלנו. והנגעוע הזה מוכן להתרפק אפילו על המילים הארמיות של ההגדה, שנשמעות כמו לחש קסם מימי תנועת הנוער.

אך גולת הכותרת של מרכז הקניות נמצאת בקומה השנייה, שם הוקם על שטח של 3000 מטרים רבועים שוק שעוצב ונראה כמו השוק הסיני בעיר האסורה, עם רעפי קרמיקה, עשרות אהילים מקוריים, מאות פסלי דרקונים ועד יצורים

משונים. כל פריט ופריט נרכש בסין האדומה. המשונע לעניין הוא שלמה כהן הכפר סבאי בשיתוף פעולה עם אלי סבירסקי מרמת גן.

השוק נמצא בצומת סטילס וקנדי והוא אתר חובה .

Community holds vigil for the 13 Iranian Jews

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Just prior to celebrating the holiday of freedom, members of the Jewish community gathered at the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue for a briefing and prayer vigil for the 13 Iranian Jews arrested 13 months ago.

Accused of spying for Israel and the United States, the 13 men are facing trial and possible death sentences. These are crimes "they could not have committed," said Dorothy Zalcman Howard, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Quebec Region.

Zalcman Howard called attention to 13 empty chairs, each draped with a tallit, representing the defendants. Of the 13, only three, including a 17-year-old, have been granted bail.

The others, said Zaki Ghavitian, president of Montreal's Iranian Jewish community, have languished in prison, having had virtually no contact with the outside world since their arrest. Ghavitian said they've only been allowed to visit their families under guard for five minutes per week.

Jack Silverstone, CJC executive vice-president, provided a report on the case and CJC's response. Since the arrest of the 13 in Shiraz, Iran, the CJC has been part of an international consortium of concerned Jewish organizations attempting to resolve the issue through diplomatic channels. However, he said, meetings with CJC representatives have been refused by the Iranian Embassy in Ottawa.

Silverstone said it had been hoped that the recent election of a moderate government in Iran would have led to a dismissal of the charges. However, he pointed out that both the conservative and moderate forces in Iran share a deep "hostility to Israel," and there has been no change in attitude since the election.

In addition to the validity of the charges, Silverstone said CJC had also expressed concern that the 13 have been denied any semblance of due process: They have not been allowed to choose their own legal counsel. Foreign observers, including diplomats and journalists, are denied access to the proceedings.

The trial, which began with a one hour session on April 13, is scheduled to continue on May 1.

Rabbi Howard Joseph, of the host congregation, said most Jews now live in countries where they are no longer persecuted simply for being Jews. "The 13 Iranian Jews are an exception in the world today."

Shlomo Avital, Consul General of Israel in Montreal, expressed "unconditional solidarity with our Iranian brothers being persecuted simply because they are Jewish."

Avital's statement of solidarity was echoed by all of the other speakers including Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron. He said secular and religious Jews alike "have no divisions on this issue."

Rabbi Poupko said the authorities in Iran should "consult the Koran and be true Muslims," and follow their own "traditions and teachings" in matters of justice.

Lawrence Bergman, Liberal MNA for D'Arcy McGee, called for the immediate release of the prisoners and "for the dismissal of all charges." Bergman said, "It's time for the Iranian government to assure the world that its citizens can live within the protection of recognized human rights."

Other speakers included Marilyn Blumer, president of Federation CJA; Alain Jean-Bart, president of the Inter-racial Relations Committee of the Montreal Urban Community; Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem; and Catherine Gauvreau of the Christian Action Committee for the Abolition of Torture.

As the briefing concluded, Zalcman Howard asked the community to write letters on behalf of the 13 Iranians to their MPs, as well as to Minister of Foreign Affairs Lloyd Axworthy and to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien.

She also asked the community to remember the names of the 13 men: Javeed Beit Yakov, Nejat Broukhim, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Faramarz Kashi, Faraz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Dani Teffilin, Omid Teffilin, Navid Bala Zadeh and Ashessr Zadmehr.

Cinema 1

6:00 pm - JEW-BOY LEVI (VIEHJUD LEVI)
Germany 1999 97 mins. Directed by Didi Danquart
German with English subtitles

Set in rural Germany in 1935, just as the Nazis were beginning to exert their influence. Levi, a highly assimilated Jewish cattle salesman, is the first to feel the insidious emergence of prejudice. A haunting drama which resonates with today's alarming resurgence of white supremacy.

With the short film IN NOVEMBER, 1943 (Canada, 8 mins)
Cinema 2

7:00 pm - VOYAGES (TRACKS)
France 1999 115 mins. Directed by Emmanuel Finkiel
French, Polish, Yiddish and Hebrew with English subtitles

Winner of the Best First Feature Film and Editing Awards at the Cesar Awards in France, 2000. Poland, Paris and Tel Aviv are the respective settings in this quiet, powerful movie that revolves around three women, connected to each other by tragic events in their pasts.
Cinema 1

4:00 pm - VIOLIN UP! ISAAC STERN IN COLOGNE
Germany 2000 43 mins. Directed by Michael Meert and Hans Hadulla
English, some German

Documents the historic and emotional 1999 visit to Germany by the 79-year-old American violinist Isaac Stern. Stern vowed never to perform in Germany, but he did agree to meet and work with German music students. A must for classical music lovers, and an intimate, behind-the-scenes look at a master. A world premiere.
Director Michael Meert will be in attendance

With the short film LEONARD, LIGHT MY CIGARETTE! (Canada, 5 mins.)
Cinema 2

4:30 pm - MENELIK-BLACK JEWISH PRINCE
Israel 1999 56 mins. Directed by Daniel Wachsmann
Hebrew with English subtitles

Documentary portrait of a young, impoverished Ethiopian Jew from Tel Aviv, who sets out to find his mother in Ethiopia. His trip parallels the legend of Menelik, reputed son of Israel's King Solomon and the Ethiopian Queen of Sheba.

With the short film THE COLOR OF JEWISH (USA, 26 mins)
Cinema 1

6:00 pm - INSIDE OUT
South Africa 1999 93 mins. Directed by Neal Sundstrom

South African comedienne Gilda Blacher stars as Hazel Levin, a feisty young Jewish actress from Johannesburg who ends up directing a small town's Christmas nativity pageant (don't ask!) A very funny fish-out-of-water fairy tale, with a South African twist.

With the short film THE WORST JEWISH FOOTBALL TEAM IN THE WORLD
(U.K. 9 mins.)
Cinema 2

7:00 pm - EGOZ
Israel 1999 120 mins. Directed by Eli Cohen
Hebrew, Arabic, and French with English subtitles

Compelling made-for-television drama focuses on the lives and loves of the prosperous Abuthol family, owners of a leading hotel in Casablanca. Acclaimed director Eli Cohen (The Summer of Aviya, Under the Domim Tree) vividly brings to life the personal stories behind the tragedy of the Egoz, a ship which sank with 44 Jewish immigrants while departing Morocco for Israel during turbulent times in 1961.
Director Eli Cohen will be in attendance.
Jacques Bensimon, Managing Director, TVO/TFO, will introduce the film.
Cinema 1

8:15 - AARON COHEN'S DEBT
Israel 1999 96 mins. Directed by Amalia Margolin
Hebrew with English subtitles

Celebrated Israeli actor Moshe Ivgi stars in this powerful prison drama about judicial indifference, based on a true story. Winner of the Rockie Award for Best Made-for-Television Movie at the 1999 Banff International Television Festival.
Actor Moshe Ivgi and writer Alon Bar will be in attendance.
Cinema 2

10:00 pm - KHROUSTALIOV, MY CAR!
Russia/France 1998 137 mins Directed by Alexei Guerman
Russian with English subtitles

An avant-garde, startlingly surrealistic depiction of the horrors of the gulag, in the last days of Stalin's Russia. Many critics consider this to be one of the most significant films of the past decade. "One of the most underestimated films of the 90s, and certainly one of the greatest," Kent Jones, Film Society of Lincoln Center

(see Tuesday, May 9, 8:15 pm for description)
Cinema 1

4:00 pm - FRANK SINATRA IS DEAD
Israel 1999 82 mins. Directed by Nadav Levitan
Hebrew with English subtitles

A private detective, obsessed with the music of Frank Sinatra and his own wife's infidelities, is the protagonist of this absorbing mystery/drama. A comic, sad riff on marital relations, trust and life.

With the short film MEMORIAL DAY (Israel, 15 mins)
Cinema 2

4:30 pm - PEACE BY PIECE
Israel 1997 60 mins Directed by Sharon Shamir
English and Hebrew and Arabic with English subtitles

A fascinating, award-winning documentary that follows the historic visit to Israel by leading Jordanian political satirists Nabil Sawalha and Hisham Yanis. This amazing story dares to suggest that Mideast peace might actually be possible--through laughter.
Director Sharon Shamir will be in attendance

With the short film WOMEN OF THE WALL (USA, 31 mins)
Cinema 1

6:30 pm - EYE WITNESS: DAVID RUBINGER, PHOTOGRAPHER
Israel 1999 45 mins. Directed by Micha Shagrir
English and Hebrew with English subtitles

An illuminating documentary portrait of world-renowned Israeli photographer David Rubinger, whose work has graced the pages of Time magazine among other international publications.

Cinema 2

7:00 pm - AUTUMN SUN
Argentina 1996 103 mins. Directed by Eduardo Mignogna
Spanish with English subtitles

Norma Aleandro (The Official Story) is exquisite as Clara Goldstein, a lonely, middle-aged Jewish woman from Buenos Aries who advertises in the personals for a Jewish boyfriend. The man who responds (Federico Luppi) - and whom she falls for - isn't Jewish. Beautifully acted. A sheer delight!
Cinema 1

9:00 pm - HIT AND RUNWAY
USA 1999 100 mins. Directed by Christopher Livingston

What happens when a gay, nebbishe Jewish playwright (a la Woody Allen) and a straight Italian would-be writer team up on a screenplay that they think will get them to Hollywood? Not what you think--in this fast and funny movie. Writing has never been so much fun!
Actor/writer/standup comic Jaffe Cohen will be in attendance.
Cinema 2

9:15 pm - THE NEW KLEZMORIM: Voices Inside the Revival of Yiddish Music
Canada 2000 60 mins. Directed by David Kaufman

World Premiere of Toronto filmmaker David Kaufman's feature documentary on the roots of Klezmer music, the people who perform it, and its recent, phenomenal popularity. Highlighted by great musical performances and interviews with giants of the field, including members of Brave Old World and The Klezmer Conservatory Band.
Director David Kaufman will be in attendance.

With the animated short films ALMONDS AND WINE (Canada, 5 mins) and VILLAGE OF IDIOTS (Canada, 13 mins.)

Coast to Coast

Hot and cold in Ottawa

It is time, once again, to tell readers who's hot and who is not in federal politics. Frigid: Former cabinet minister, Diane Marleau has been virtually frozen out of the Liberal caucus. Isolated and bitter since having been dumped in last summer's cabinet shuffle, Marleau's frustrations have triggered increasingly barbed attacks on Jean Chrétien and his policies. Most recently, she levelled an unprecedented broadside on both the PM and Allan Rock regarding healthcare. The chances of Chrétien signing her nomination papers have been placed on the critical list.

Cold: Preston Manning has developed a sudden case of the chills. Initially, he was pleased Stockwell Day had entered the Canadian Alliance leadership race thus lending the process some much-needed credibility. But the announcement by Frank Klees in Ontario about withdrawing from the race because of strings attached to campaign contributions was not welcome news. It is no secret that the Toronto money is stacking up behind Day – and that has Manning very worried. He is only marginally stronger out West than the Alberta treasurer is and that support is fickle. If western Reformers sense that Day will finally allow them to break through in Ontario, it is Manning who will be left out in the cold.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Warm: Jane Stewart, one of the classiest politicians around is feeling warm and fuzzy as she sees light at the end of the HRD scandal-ridden tunnel. Throughout her ordeal in the House, Stewart was buoyed by the support she received from friends and political colleagues. She has chosen to heed the brutal lessons of the last two months, confirming that her rising star status really is sterling rather than silver plate.

Hot: Elinor Caplan has shown great poise ever since she was promoted to cabinet and scored big points with the new refugee regulations. Of special note to Canadian Jewry was her decision to effectively disqualify Russian refugee claimants from Israel. She was also unruffled by reports that Chrétien and Ehud Barak had cemented a deal on Palestinian refugees. Her cool head in the scrum translated into being a "hot" property.

Hot (under the collar): Stan Keyes, the Hamilton MP who publicly called for Chrétien to quit. He felt awfully lonely when none of his caucus colleagues would join in the chorus, despite private indications that they would. Now, Keyes is in hot water with both the PMO and the Martin camp – which has suffered the consequences of the failed back-room coup.

Celebrities paint plates for Montreal AIDS home

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Madonna and daughter Lourdes finger-painted a multi-coloured montage.

Comedian Bobby Slayton, a veteran of the Nasty Show, included the Just for Laughs Festival's red-and-green mascot, adding a hanging spider, just to make sure no one thought he was getting sentimental.

Author Margaret Atwood portrayed herself as a stick figure with letters of the alphabet exploding out of her frizzy head.

What the three have in common is that they are among 250 famous people who donated hand-painted and autographed china dinner plates at the request of the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), Montreal section.

The plates will be auctioned off at a gala evening, May 18, in Le Windsor's ballroom. Proceeds will benefit Maison Chesed House, the NCJW's planned residence for persons living with HIV/AIDS.

It took the organization nearly two years to track down, persuade and collect the creations of the celebrities, said Lillian Shoub, local NCJW president.

The great majority of the contributors are Canadian, but there are international stars. They come from entertainment, the arts, sports, politics, literature and business.

The list is eclectic. Who would have thought chamber musicians Brott would find common cause with the rock group Tragically Hip or bad boy-fiddler Ashley MacIsaac? TV divas Pamela Wallin, Dini Petty and Valerie Pringle have set aside their differences, as have coaches Pat Quinn of the Toronto Maple Leafs and Jacques Demers, formerly of the Montreal Canadiens.

Few personalities refused to participate; the tough part was getting past agents, said Stephen Rosen, co-ordinator of the Chesed project and the support services the NCJW is currently offering those with HIV/AIDS.

Their assignment was simple. The celebrities were sent a plate and a kit with brushes and acrylic paint. "They could do anything: paint a picture or a design of their choice and sign it," Shoub said.

The contributions ranged from simple symbols of their "trade" to elaborate tableaux which filled the plates to the rim.

"The first goal of this event, more than the money, is to raise awareness that AIDS has not disappeared, that the infection rates continue to rise, especially among women, and that there is a need to provide a caring environment for people in crisis who have nowhere to go," Shoub said.

The plan is to acquire a building in the west end to house a dozen persons with AIDS in a home-like setting. These would include both the dying and those who need somewhere to stay while convalescing from treatments.

Hillel director sees new era on the horizon

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For Simon Ben-Simon, becoming the new director of the Hillel Jewish Student Centre seemed a natural next step for someone whose career has always been connected to young people.

Among other positions, Ben-Simon has worked with FEDERATION CJA's Young Adult Division, the youth department of Canadian Zionist Federation and the March of the Living.

"I've interacted with young people my whole career," says the 37-year-old Ben-Simon. "It's always been a passion."

Ben-Simon is coming to Hillel, which serves Montreal's CEGEP and university Jewish student populations, at a time when it's been operating without a full-time executive director for six months.

Previous director Steven Spodek left Hillel last year, and longtime community professional Michael Crelinsten was hired to fill in temporarily before departing himself. Hillel's chaplain, Rabbi David Merling, has been serving as acting director.

Ben-Simon, for the last two years director of FEDERATION CJA's Israel and overseas department, says that when he begins his new job May 1, it will be with an eye towards truly reinvigorating the student agency, injecting it with a new sense of "hipness," dynamism and activity it hasn't seen for years.

More specifically, Ben-Simon says he would like to see a new "synergy" created and alliances formed with community and non-community structures involving young people, ranging from FEDERATION CJA's FederatioNext – sort of an off-campus community agency for university students – to synagogue Zionist groups, and even the Jewish Law Students Association.

This approach seems in keeping with the FEDERATION CJA white paper, which recommended creating a "permanent co-ordinating body that brings together student, lay and professional leadership responsible for Hillel and FederatioNext."

The federation felt there was too much "overlap and lack of resource co-ordination" between Hillel and FederatioNext.

But Ben-Simon seemed to resist the notion that any new, improved Hillel would come across as a version of federation on campus.

One way Ben-Simon sees Hillel evolving is by having such groups such as Contact ProMontreal and the Israel Experience be "part of the Hillel scene," but he also wants Hillel to be more involved in the community in general, in an outreach way, and to be more open to things it has never done before.

That could mean anything from being more involved with the Jewish community's seniors population, having "non-Jewish" issues debated at Hillel and organizing a student-run Jewish film festival, to running travel programs, staging Jewish band jam sessions or organizing oneg Shabbats with Jewish professors. Maybe even a "Jewish travel library" at the main Hillel centre on Stanley Street.

"The issue is Jewish identity," Ben-Simon said. "For those who are affiliated and for those who are unaffiliated, the question should be: 'How do I connect?' "

That's a question Hillel has had to deal with more creatively since the days when issues such as the plight of Soviet Jewry, which once galvanized Jewish students into mass activism, have more or less fallen by the wayside.

Ben-Simon noted, however, that Israel will inevitably remain a central element for Jewish student affiliation, and recruitment for Israel programs will be a part of what Hillel will be about.

But politically, he suggested, the era is over where Israel's very existence is an issue.

"It's not 1982," he said, referring to the time when Israel was embroiled in Lebanon.

Ben-Simon said one of his main interests is to make the Stanley and Gatineau street centres (the latter is the primarily for francophone students) the "focal points" for activities, aside from any other Jewish student-related activities that might take place on the campuses themselves.

Why did he apply for the job?

"Because the youth and student agenda is a world that interests me a lot," he replied.

"This is a challenge as a Jewish community professional. I am confident I can make a difference, to bring back the agency to the forefront of the youth agenda."

Israel, PA expect to miss May deadline

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Senior Israeli and Palestinian negotiators said Sunday they expect to miss the May target date for the framework agreement for a final peace in September.

Chief Israeli negotiator Oded Eran said dates were in any event unimportant – and the planned May accord could be signed by June. Senior Palestinian negotiator Mahmoud Abbas, also known as Abu Mazen, blamed Israel for the delays.

He said the sides would most likely miss the September deadline for forging a treaty as well.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak had promised to accelerate the peace process after his election last year, and had insisted on the framework accord. When the sides missed a February target, he set a May 13 date and the Palestinians accepted it.

"I don't want to attach importance to the date. If we don't reach it in May, we can reach it in June," Eran said. He is also ambassador to Jordan and was speaking in Eilat during the first official visit to Israel by Jordan's King Abdullah. "There is a likelihood we will reach an agreement in the next few months," Eran said.

In an interview published Sunday by the London-based Saudi daily newspaper Asharq al-Awsat, Abu Mazen said: "I believe that in light of the current Israeli policy we will not reach a solution either in May or September."

Following a request by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat for greater American involvement, U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross will take part in two weeks of talks starting next Sunday in Eilat.

Arafat is hoping peace talks will make swifter progress following his recent meeting with U.S. President Bill Clinton, an Egyptian official said.

Arafat hopes the planned September treaty – addressing the toughest issues – borders, Jerusalem, Palestinian refugees and Jewish settlers – will lead to the declaration of an independent Palestinian state.

"When two sides or more enter into negotiations it is impossible for one side to reach 100 percent of its wishes and dreams. And if this is the case, then it is a bad agreement. We will have to take painful decisions," Eran said.

Abu Mazen said the Palestinians had already taken all the necessary painful compromises during the interim period which led to the establishment of the Palestinian Authority on parts of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"Hence we will be unable to take more painful decisions," Abu Mazen said. Minister Haim Ramon said he believed the sides could agree on all the issues except for east Jerusalem.

Abdullah envisions an 'open Jerusalem'

One is a division of the city into two political domains, and the other a declaration of Jerusalem as an open city to all three Abrahamic religions – Judaism, Christianity and Islam – and he declared that Jordan is the guardian of the city's holy places for Islam.

According to the king, Jordan has a direct interest in the final-status agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. "There are questions that affect us on a daily basis, like security and borders. The refugee issue and Jerusalem are close to our hearts, and the water problem has to be solved at the bilateral, trilateral and regional level."

As if to emphasize the point, while the king met with Barak, Jordanian ministers and their Israeli counterparts met to discuss outstanding issues ranging from progress on joint tourism projects – such as an international airport at Evrona and the border crossing point where the Jordanian-Israeli peace treaty was signed by Abdullah's father King Hussein and the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin – to the thorny issue of Israel allowing Jordan more trade into the West Bank.

Accompanied by his queen, the king steered his royal yacht from Aqaba into Israeli waters and was greeted by a flotilla of Israeli yachts. The yachts escorted him to a naval base in Eilat which was bedecked with Israeli and Jordanian flags.

"Land-for-peace has been accepted by all parties since 1991 and must continue to guide us, wherever obstacles in the process emerge," the king said at the red- carpet ceremony. "The Palestinian issue is a central one in the Arab-Israeli conflict and I am very hopeful that this year will witness a breakthrough that will give hope to the Palestinians and the justice they seek and to the Israeli people and the security that they desire," the king said, urging progress toward a peace agreement with the Palestinians, Syria and Lebanon.

Abdullah, crowned 14 months ago, has met Barak several times in the past but had refrained from visiting Israel because of regional tensions and deadlocked Palestinian peace talks.

Court convicts five in Maccabiah bridge disaster

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An Israeli court has convicted five people in connection with the collapse of a bridge at the 1997 Maccabiah Games that left four Australian athletes dead and scores of others injured.

A three-judge panel found the five defendants guilty of negligence following a trial that lasted more than two years and saw more than 80 witnesses testify. The offence can carry a penalty of up to four years in jail. Sentences will be handed out at a later date.

The five who were convicted are: contractors Baruch Karagula and Yehoshua Ben-Ezra; engineer Micha Bar-Ilan; subcontractor Adam Mishori; and Yoram Eyal, the head of the Maccabi World Union's (MWU) organizing committee.

Two Australian athletes were killed immediately and hundreds of other participants were injured when the pedestrian bridge collapsed during the opening ceremonies of the "Jewish Olympics," plunging scores of people into the Yarkon River.

Two more Australians died weeks later as a result of complications linked to contaminants in the river, and dozens of athletes who were injured in the bridge collapse later suffered illnesses.

Australian Jews applauded the verdict.

"Nothing can ever truly compensate those who lost loved ones and have suffered such a tremendous diminishment of their quality of life," said Nina Bassat, president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry. "What the verdict affirms is that the tragedy was avoidable and happened because of criminal negligence."

Some of the victims' relatives also expressed relief at the verdict.

Colin Elterman, whose 18-year-old daughter Sasha has undergone more than 30 operations since falling into the Yarkon, said the verdict sent a "clear message" to all those who sit on the boards of "inefficient organizations that they can not play fast and loose with public safety."

Now is the time for the MWU to "reorganize, rebuild and be the caring organization it claims to be," he said.

Henry Sawicki, whose wife Elizabeth died two weeks after the bridge collapse, from lung complications that hospital officials attributed to the polluted river, said the court's finding was "great news" and that "a jail sentence is the least they should get."

Lynne Zines, the widow of another victim, Warren, who also died from an infection caused by his ingesting the polluted water, said the verdict is "just a big relief, and I hope it will lead to the resignations" of other Maccabi officials.

Her son Adam said the relatives had never sought vengeance against those responsible for the bridge collapse, "but [wanted] to get justice for the pain and suffering we have gone through over the past three years."

A week after the collapse, an Israeli commission found that the accident was caused by a chain of failures involving the bridge's planning and construction.

In October 1997, an Australian newspaper that had tests conducted on the water in the river concluded that athletes "fell into a deadly cocktail of chemicals and pollutants" resembling "diluted sewage."

Many of the Australian athletes have filed lawsuits against the MWU and the builders of the bridge, demanding damages for injuries, mental anguish and loss of income.

In last week's decision, judges Edna Beckenstein, Amiram Binyamini and Mordechai Peled ruled there had been a complete lack of co-ordination between the parties responsible for building the bridge.The judges also ruled the defendants approached the erection of the bridge with a lack of professionalism and attention and a callous disregard for human life. The bridge itself was built by persons not certified to do so. Experts who testified during the trial said the bridge's construction was "one big improvisation" and that the welding done on the construction was "entirely substandard."

Eyal, the head of the organizing committee, sounded a repentant note after the verdict was read.

"The regret and pain of the incident will certainly accompany me and my colleagues in Maccabi until the end of our lives," he said. "We just hope the lessons will be learned and compensation arranged quickly because the suffering of the families is awful."

He also described the Games as a "great Zionist enterprise" that he hopes will "continue to exist in the future."

Ha'aretz reported that Ezzy Netanel, chair of the MWU, announced his resignation in the wake of Eyal's conviction, explaining that "Eyal did what he did with authorization and permission."

Elterman called for full insurance payments to the victims' families.

"After almost three years, the victims now hope that the guilty verdicts will fast-track settlements of the civil claims generally and end the ongoing nightmare for the victims," he said.

Asked about threats by the Australian Jewish community to boycott the Israeli delegation to the Sydney Olympics this year, Elterman said that if a "public apology" is made by the MWU and its leaders resign, "there is no doubt that the tension will decrease and the pressure within the Jewish community of Australia will be reduced."

Attorney Ehud Stein, who represents 50 of the 60 families that have filed a civil suit against those responsible for the disaster, said he spoke with Tom Danos, president of Australia's Maccabi organization. He said Danos told him the Australian Jewish community is pleased with the verdict and views it as the "first stage."

Danos recently asked Israeli lawmakers to help ensure the replenishment of an aid fund of $500,000 that Israel set up to help the victims pay medical and legal costs.

Another lawsuit in Irving's arsenal

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Holocaust denier David Irving is proceeding with a libel action, despite his much-publicized recent defeat in a similar lawsuit.

Irving is now suing the Observer, a London Sunday newspaper and British journalist Gitta Sereny. She and the Observer are asking the courts to nullify Irving's action against them in light of his defeat last week in his libel suit against Holocaust scholar Deborah Lipstadt and her publisher, Penguin Books.

The judge in that case ruled that Irving is an anti-Semitic Holocaust denier and Hitler apologist who distorted historical data to suit his own ideological agenda.

Irving's latest case is based on an article by Sereny, Spin Time for Hitler, which was published in the Observer on April 21, 1996.

Irving claims the article accuses him of inflating tenfold the death toll in the wartime Allied air raid on Dresden, of obtaining the microfiche plates of the Josef Goebbels diaries in Moscow by subterfuge, and of using "invention, omission or distortion to express an obsession."

Irving is claiming damages on the grounds that the Observer failed to publish his reply to the article and that Sereny had pursued a campaign of defamation against him for nearly 20 years.

The Observer has already spent some $1 million (US) preparing its defence against Irving's charges.

Sereny, born in Vienna, achieved international acclaim with her 1983 book, Into That Darkness, a study of Treblinka death camp commandant Franz Stangl, and Albert Speer: His Battle With Truth, which was published in 1995.

The disgraced Irving, who is facing bankruptcy from a legal bill of some $5 million as a result of his defeat in the Lipstadt trial, is also facing arrest warrants in Germany and the United States.

The German warrant, issued by a court in Mannheim, accuses Irving of engaging in Holocaust denial – a criminal offense in Germany – during a speech he made there in 1996.

Holocaust denier suing English newspaper

Also, a California court has issued a warrant for his arrest for failing to repay a $10,000 loan.

The loan, made in 1997 to help Irving publish and reprint four of his books, came from an American supporter, Max Kerstan, a former member of Hitler's army who died that same year.

The loan agreement stipulated that the money had to be repaid over a four-month period at 15 percent interest. But soon after Kerstan's death, Irving claimed that the former German soldier had converted the loan into a gift.

He also claimed that Kerstan had changed his will, leaving him the bulk of his $2 million estate.

When Kerstan's widow, Irma, sued to recoup the loan in 1998, Irving told the court that his late benefactor intended to cancel the debt and change his will because his own family did not share his controversial views on Holocaust denial.

Irving lost the case, but he failed to repay the loan or to attend a debtors' court to which he was summoned shortly after the court judgment. He has now been found in contempt and a warrant has been issued for his arrest.

There was more bad news, not only for Irving, but also for those supporters who made financial contributions to his libel lawsuit against Lipstadt.

After Irving said he will not be able to pay Lipstadt's costs, her legal team said it will try to recover the funds from his financial supporters.

"Irving will be pursued for every penny of the costs," said a member of the defence team, "and if we don't get the money from him we will go to the judge and ask him to order Irving to divulge the names of his financial backers."

Irving, who defended himself in his lawsuit against Lipstadt, appears to be facing severe financial difficulties.

His main asset, a $1.5 million apartment in London, is heavily mortgaged, and he is already facing bankruptcy proceedings by a firm of London lawyers.

IAF looking to fly farther afield for defence reasons

By REUVEN PEDATZUR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A recent edition of Aviation Week devotes its cover story to the Israel Air Force. The facts and analyses presented in the detailed article indicate that the author received considerable co-operation from the IAF's senior commanders, who utilized the article as a platform for describing their professional world view, declaring their intentions and outlining the IAF's acquisition plans for the present decade.

It is doubtful whether Israeli military censorship would ever have authorized an Israeli newspaper or journal to publish the facts and figures that appear in the Aviation Week article.

According to Aviation Week, the IAF's projected modernization program will cost some $30 billion. This huge amount is intended primarily to provide the IAF with the capacity for operating much further away from home than it now does. According to top-ranking IAF officers, including its outgoing commander, Maj.-Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliahu, the gaze of the IAF's senior personnel is directed toward the horizon.

The goal they have set is for the IAF to have the capability to attack ballistic-missile launch sites in Iran and Iraq.

Apparently, the IAF's upper command has reached the conclusion that the most lethal threat Israel will face over the next few years will be the presence of ballistic missiles in the arsenals of peripheral states such as Iran and Iraq, which, although not sharing a border with Israel, are hostile to Israel.

It is expected that some of these missiles will carry non-conventional warheads – chemical, biological and, in the not-too-distant future, nuclear.

In view of this situation, the IAF's main efforts in the areas of development and acquisitions will be directed toward effectively coping with this threat.

The IAF has purchased F-15s and F-16s with a sizable operational range that would give Israel the capacity to strike at targets in Iran. To enhance this capacity, the IAF will also be developing remote-controlled pilotless aircraft or UAVs (unmanned aerial vehicles) that will carry innovative missiles capable of knocking out mobile ballistic missile launchers deep inside Iranian or Iraqi territory.

The UAVs will have evasion features and jet engines and will be capable of remaining aloft for 60 consecutive hours above the enemy's launch areas.

Each UAV would carry 10 high-speed air-to-surface missiles that would be used to destroy the launchers after they have been located.

Sophisticated methods have been developed for identifying mobile enemy launchers. These include state-of-the-art sensors that would be fitted on UAVs, on high-tech intelligence-gathering aircraft and on spy-in-the-sky satellites, all of which Israel would develop on its own, in order not to be dependent on information provided by American spy satellites.

The Arrow anti-missile missile defence system does not answer all of the IAF's defence requirements.

Thus the IAF is expected to develop and utilize a broad-based arsenal that will be sophisticated and expensive, and will include fighter planes, UAVs, spy planes and spy satellites. The prime function of this cutting-edge arsenal will be to provide the IAF with the capacity to search out and destroy enemy launchers and thereby prevent the launching of ballistic missiles at targets in Israel's territory.

Undoubtedly, the IAF's assessment of potential (but very real) threats is correct. The truly alarming scenario would be a strategic war. Distant threats, in the form of ballistic missiles, could determine the outcome of a war.

For this reason, the decision has been made to invest a large sum of money to enable the IAF to counter the threat of ballistic missiles.

However, an analysis of both the IAF's acquisitions program and the combat doctrine it is working on for effectively dealing with the strategic threat raises a number of serious questions.

Over the next few years, massive resources will be allocated, as noted above, for the development of the IAF's capacity for attacking ballistic missile launchers.

This is a difficult and complex challenge, however, not just because the Iranian missile launchers would be positioned at a distance of more than 1,200 kilometres from Israel's borders, but also because the Iranians have learned the lessons of the Gulf War.

When Israeli UAVs cross into Iranian airspace and begin searching for missile launchers, it is reasonable to assume that they will patrol areas containing dummy launchers made of cloth or metal that will make it difficult for the UAVs to carry out their search-and-destroy operations.

It should be recalled here that in the Gulf War, the Americans made 3,000 sorties to attack Iraqi missile launchers, but were unable to destroy even one launcher – one of the reasons being that the Iraqis made widespread use of dummy launchers.

The difficulties involved in search-and-destroy operations against missile launchers will only increase in the future; thus there is serious doubt about the wisdom of enhancing search-and-destroy capacity and about the military dividends that can be generated from such a major investment in this area.

If we also factor in the immense resources that will still be required to complete the development of the Arrow anti-missile missile defence system, we come up with a problematic picture. The prospects of the Arrow's becoming an effective defence system against long-range missiles with non-conventional warheads are slim indeed.

Even the Arrow's developers themselves admit that, at this stage at least, the defence system cannot provide adequate solutions to meet such threats as self-manoeuvring missiles, sub-munitions, large missile barrages, instrument- and radar-jamming devices and decoys.

The IAF is the principal element in the Israel Defence Force's preparations for dealing with the strategic wars of the future. We should take a close look at the planned investments and we should avoid ineffective developmental directions whose chances for success are small.

In the final analysis, Israeli strategy will have to be based on deterrence, and not on attempts to destroy enemy missiles, whether they are still on the ground or already airborne. The bulk of our resources should be earmarked for the reinforcement of our deterrent capacity, not for the reinforcement of our defence capabilities.

Italian Jewish author dead at 84

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegrapahic Agency

ROME — Italian Jewish author Giorgio Bassani, whose books describe the plight of Jews during the rise of fascism, died April 13 at the age of 84.

Bassani was best known for his 1962 novel, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis, which was later made into a movie that won the Oscar for best foreign film in 1971.

"The memory of the great writer will remain alive in all of us," Italian Prime Minister Massimo D'Alema said in a message to the family. "The poetry and political commitment of his work place it among the most beautiful pages of 20th-century Italian literature."

Set in the years 1938 to 1942, the novel told the story of the Finzi-Continis, an aristocratic Jewish family blinded by wealth and status to the encroaching realities of fascism and World War II, until it was deported to Nazi death camps.

Obituary

The impending tragedy is used as the backdrop for a love story between Giorgio, the son of a middle-class Jewish family, and Micol, the beautiful daughter of the Finzi-Continis.

"Bassani was the first – and perhaps the best – writer to talk about the condition of Italy's Jews under the 1938 Racial Laws, which the Italian people had embraced with great indifference toward the Jews," said Tullia Zevi, a former president of Italy's Jewish community.

Bassani was born in 1916 in Bologna, but lived much of his life in Ferrara, a town near Venice, with a long and rich Jewish history. He grew up there in an opulent villa that served as the model for the Finzi-Contini mansion.

Bassani was persecuted under the 1938 Racial Laws and had to publish his first works under a pseudonym. During World War II, he was jailed briefly for anti-fascist activities.

Bassani, who was also a poet, won many top literary prizes and also was active in the environmental protection movement.

His death came after a long battle with Alzheimer's disease.

His final years were marked by a bitter, public feud over his estate between his estranged wife and his current companion, the American Portia Prebys.

Zionism and democracy are pillars to be preserved

By NATAN SHARANSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd..

Zionism and democracy are the two pillars of Israel. They are the foundations upon which Israeli life is based; the fulfilment of one is conditional upon the implementation of the other.

That is what I believe, and I try to act according to this belief. To many, this statement will sound more like a slogan than a plan for action, but the Israeli reality reconfirms it, time after time.

Natan Sharansky

Only recently, when I made two separate decisions regarding related issues, did it become clear to me to what extent this statement reflects the reality of our lives here.

This past February, I was asked to review a recommendation submitted by an investigative committee to determine the boundaries between Rosh Ha'ayin and Kafr Kasm; the committee had completed its work in July 1997.

The committee recommended annexing to Kafr Kasm the areas north of the Trans-Samaria highway, except for the area of the Rosh Ha'ayin industrial zone, in order to designate it for industrial and residential uses. I thoroughly reviewed the committee's recommendations and found them to be satisfactory in terms of their professionalism.

Around a week ago, I received the recommendations of a committee reviewing illegal construction in the Arab sector.

Analysis

The report paints a grim picture of noticeable increases in the scale of illegal construction, which overburdens infrastructures, including roads, drainage systems and educational and community buildings, which are insufficient to meet the needs of a growing population to begin with; damages the environment; and swallows up open spaces, a resource rapidly disappearing from the local landscape.

A constant tension exists between the two principles

The committee recommended taking determined steps to halt the phenomenon, among others, by razing at least some of the illegally constructed buildings while creating fitting conditions to resolve the problem of overcrowded housing in these communities.

I decided to adopt the recommendations of both committees. It is the right step to take. Objectively, it is the right step. But it is also the right step to take based on a broader vision of the state's best interests, the best interests of the people for whom the state was established and the best interests of all the state's residents.

Unfortunately, only a few people reacted to the decision in a relevant manner. In a polarized society such as ours, every decision is catalogued according to a political label. If you hand over land to Israeli Arabs, you are anti-Zionist; if you decide to raze illegal buildings built in the Arab sector, you are undemocratic.

Contrary to the critics, I claim that the decisions were based on two principles – Zionism and democracy. In my view, the two principles represent the basic ideological underpinnings of Israel and are intertwined and conditional upon each other.

A constant tension exists between the two principles. The task of living amid this continuous tension is not an easy one. Many times, because of an overly demanding reality, fatigue, inattention or whatever other reason, we favour one principle over the other.

We are a relatively young country that has been coping, since its first days, with complex issues simultaneously: the return of a people from 70 Diaspora communities to its land and its re-establishment in the land it had been exiled from 2,000 years earlier; a continuous struggle with Arab countries for recognition of our existence as a sovereign state in the Middle East; life in a society with a Jewish majority alongside a large Arab minority; the building of an independent society with economic strength and political stability.

These are only some of the issues that have accompanied us during our 52 years of existence as a state.

Dealing with the problems before us only on the basis of the Zionist ideal while overlooking the principle of democracy is liable to turn us into an oppressor of the minorities living among us and, consequently, our own oppressor.

Tyranny of any kind cannot survive for long. It carries within it the seeds of its own destruction.

However, democracy also cannot exist without national consciousness and identity. It is not arbitrary. It cannot operate in a vacuum. It is part of the way of life of a nation, society and state with a defined identity. Without these, democracy cannot exist.

In my opinion, Israel is moving to resolve each of these issues by realizing the need, throughout the state's entire existence, to handle them in accordance with the two underlying principles. If you look at the development of the state and its society, you see that the Zionist dream and the ingathering of the exiles cannot be realized without democracy; likewise, there can be no democratic life here without Zionism.

Therefore, it is incumbent on us, as elected representatives, to make decisions that will simultaneously ensure the existence of both Zionism and democracy. It is the right thing to do. It is not simple; often, it entails difficulties and causes ostracism.

However, any attempt to flee from it only worsens the problem and heightens the danger. Running away from problems may, perish the thought, cause us to lose both Zionism and democracy.

Doing the right thing according to Zionism and democracy is what will guarantee the existence of the State of Israel and strengthen it. Because I am an optimistic person, I believe that that is also what will eventually happen.

What Israel needs now: to reconcile Judaism, democracy

By ELLA BELFER
Special to The CJN

Is a "culture war" between religious and secular Israelis inevitable? Are Torah values and democratic values irreconcilable?

Absolutely not. Ancient Jewish and modern democratic values are inextricably linked and should be mutually reinforcing.

Opinion

Our Jewish tradition helped to make modern, western democracy possible. The likes of Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton and John Locke relied heavily on biblical precepts when they espoused democratic principles.

The Torah and the prophets taught about limiting the powers of kings and laid the foundations for the principles of equality and freedom as we understand them today. Rabbinic literature offers many lessons about the importance of individual autonomy, tolerance for different views, even pluralism.

There is a small but exciting movement in Israel today to teach secular and religious students these common roots and the shared premises of Judaism and democracy. What Israel needs now is an expansion of these efforts to reach many more people.

Doing so will move Israel closer to a renewed consciousness of a shared community. That, in turn, should create a new set of core assumptions about society that would be shared by all Israelis, whether or not they believe in God or practise the Jewish religion.

A new social contract that synthesizes Jewish and democratic values will become possible, through a process of dynamic discourse that stresses inclusiveness and aims at concrete compromises.

Observant and non-observant Israeli Jews will always differ on some fundamental issues. But those differences need not – and must not – result in a culture war that ignores what they have in common.

Prof. Ella Belfer is Avi Chai professor of Judaism and Society at Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan, Israel.

Let's talk real baby talk

Was your pregnancy test positive? Have you just become a new mom? Welcome to the wonderful adventure of motherhood, but don't forget to hold on because you're in for quite a ride.

"Becoming a mother can be one of the most exhilarating experiences, but it can also be difficult and challenging" says Brenley Shapiro, president of Babies & Beyond. It is a joyous yet turbulent period filled with mixed emotions, tremendous transitions, and exhaustion. With life's focus now on baby, the big question is what about mom?

Brenley Shapiro's response - the development of Babies & Beyond. Babies & Beyond offers specialized groups geared specifically for new moms, providing education, information, and stimulating group discussions. Group topics focus on lifestyle changes, understanding infancy, parenting skills and much more. A nice weekly outing to look forward to. Amy Krawitz, a past group member, states that "the group offers a wealth of information and provides a wonderful network to connect with other new moms. I highly recommend it."

From education, to discussions, to building long lasting friendships and playgroups, Babies & Beyond covers it all. A fabulous new program helping moms, babies and families thrive.

New drug approved against non-Hodgkins lymphoma

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Rituxan, a drug just approved by Health Canada, offers hope for those suffering with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma.

Non-Hodgkin's lymphoma (NHL) is a cancer of the lymph system. Malignant or cancerous immune cells, lymphocytes, multiply uncontrollably, impairing normal cell function and the body's ability to fight infection.

Symptoms include swelling of the lymph nodes, fever, anemia, weight loss and fatigue.

Speaking at a recent press conference, medical oncologist Neil Berinstein, director of the advanced therapeutics program at Toronto Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre of Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre, explained that Rituxan is one of a new class of anti-cancer drugs called monoclonal antibodies.

Another one is Herceptin, which is being used to treat breast cancer.

These drugs, which he referred to as "designer drugs," recognize and destroy only cancerous cells. "Rituxan targets and terminates cancer cells by binding to a protein known as the CD20 antigen, which regulates cell death."

This drug is given in a series of four injections on an outpatient basis over a 22 day period. The first one takes between 5½ and 6½ hours, while the rest take between three and four hours.

There are very few side effects, other than flu-like symptoms such as fever and chills on the first treatment, which are controlled by Tylenol and Benedryl. This is in sharp contrast to standard chemotherapy, which can cause hair loss, loss of appetite, weight loss, fatigue, nausea and vomiting, and increased susceptibility to infection. These side effects are not only physically debilitating, but psychologically traumatic.

Because of the ease of administration and the few side effects, Berinstein said Rituxan can be given in clinics or at doctor's offices.

In recent studies, 42 percent of patients found that their tumours shrunk by more than 50 percent. Half maintained that result for a year.

Berinstein said that he expects even better results when Rituxan is used early in the course of the disease, and when combined with chemotherapy or stem cell therapy.

Myron Czuczman, head of lymphoma service at Roswell Park Cancer Institute in Buffalo, cautioned against unrestrained optimism, warning that there is still no cure for NHL. "Most [people with the disease] will succumb to it," he said bluntly.

However, he said, Rituxan significantly improves the quality of life, and allows time for the body to heal.

Instances of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma have nearly doubled in Canada, the United States and Europe since the 1970s, said Czuczman. "It is now the fifth most common form of cancer – almost an epidemic."

He said that he believes that this is due to environmental causes, such as pesticides, herbicides and industrial dumps.

NYGH to reorganize patient services

TORONTO — North York Hospital (NYGH) has announced it is planning to reorganize patient services at its Branson and general divisions.

The reorganization, planned to take effect in mid-September, is a step towards complying with the directions of the Health Services Restructuring Commission (HSRC).

The HSRC directed North York General Hospital to assume the governance, management and operation of North York Branson Hospital, and to convert the site into an ambulatory care centre with a focus on services for seniors.

The hospital's CEO, Murray MacKenzie, says the reorganization was driven by the need to address several significant concerns that affects the hospital's ability to keep Branson open as a broad-service acute care site for an extended time.

Access to care was an issue for many hospitals over the winter months as they struggled with overcrowded emergency departments. One of the reasons for emergency department overcrowding, is that patients requiring admission cannot be transferred to inpatient beds. Many of these beds are occupied by people awaiting placement in long term-care, chronic care or rehab hospitals, MacKenzie said. Over the last year, 25 to 30 percent of NYGH's inpatient beds were occupied by people who would be better served in a different setting.

"We want to make sure patients receive the kind of care they need in the most appropriate setting. There simply isn't enough capacity in the system to transfer out all the patients who need to be in rehab or nursing homes. With this plan, we will create our own capacity to provide these patients with the appropriate level of care," he said.

"None of these changes will take place until the first phase of our 5,000-square-foot emergency expansion at the general division is finished. We expect construction to be completed in the summer, and then we will be ready to handle an increased caseload in the general division emergency department."

The new organization calls for the creation of a facility at the Branson site to treat urgent problems such as cuts, broken bones, bronchitis and asthma. If a patient has a more serious problem that requires admission to hospital, arrangements will be made to transfer them by ambulance to the general division emergency department at Leslie and Sheppard.

"This centre will help alleviate the pressure on local emergency departments by providing rapid, high quality and efficient care for patients with acute medical problems," says Dr. Tim Rutledge, chief of emergency services.

Plenty of Holocaust-themed videos are available

LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Fifty-five years after the end of World War II, the Holocaust is the central focus of an ever growing number of films and videos around the world.

This is clearly evident when we see the number of Holocaust films that have appeared in local movie theatres lately, and the number of videos regarding the topic that line the shelves of video stores.

Films such as Schindler's List and Life Is Beautiful have made huge amounts of box office dollars. At the same time, less successful films such as Jakob The Liar, Train of Life and The Truce have made their way across the world's film screens.

On video, this trend is even more profound. Not only have most of the films already mentioned made their way into video stores, but a host of others are available for those who wish to search for them. In fact, it would be very easy for video stores to set up a Holocaust section. There is no lack of titles with which to stock it.

Why have so many Holocaust films been produced? And why are the number of such films constantly increasing?

Part of the reason may be the growing self-discovery of the Jewish community in North America, and even in Europe. For many years after the Holocaust, very little was said or written about the topic.

In the immediate post-war period, most survivors wanted to get on with their lives. They wanted to start families and live normal lives. Some survivors did not even tell their children about their experiences during the war.

Maybe the memories were too fresh and too powerful. Maybe some people wanted to forget the horrors. Maybe the emphasis was on recovery and recuperation, and the focus shifted to the creation and preservation of the State of Israel.

That is not to say there were no films in these early days. Polish director Alexander Ford made a remarkable film called Border Street in the late 1940s and a handful of films came out of Eastern Europe.

There were also films such as the excellent Czech film The Shop on Main Street (1965); the French film The Two of Us (1968) and the Italian classic The Garden of the Finzi-Continis (1971).

John Turturro in Francesco Rosi's The Truce.

In the United States, there were a few attempts to broach the subject with The Diary of Anne Frank (1959) and Judgment at Nuremburg (1961), but these were usually made to deal with broader subjects such as brotherhood and justice.

There were a few exceptions such as The Pawnbroker (1965), but these were unusual occurrences. The landmark event that opened the floodgates seemed to be the 1978 television miniseries, Holocaust.

This production seemed to touch a collective nerve throughout the world. It was seen by enormous numbers of people, many of whom knew little or nothing about the Holocaust.

Since then, the Holocaust has become less of a taboo subject, and some excellent films have been produced, most of which are available on video.

The French films Au Revoir Les Enfants and Shoah, and the German Europa, Europa are among the best of this genre. From Poland came Korczak, the story of the famous Jewish doctor, writer and child expert who chose to accompany the children of his orphanage to the gas chambers.

We have seen such films as Triumph of the Spirit (1989), The Truce (1997) and Schindler's List (1993). The aftermath of the Holocaust has been shown in such films as Enemies: A Love Story (1989), The Music Box (1989) and such television films as Max and Helen (1990) and A Call To Remember (1997).

The list is almost endless. Including documentaries and short films there are probably several hundred films and videos on the market about the Holocaust.

People interested in obtaining such videos should check with their local video stores, the Columbia House Video Club or several of the Internet merchants such as Ergo, Facets, Amazon, Big Star and others.

TRAVEL TALK
BY BILL GLADSTONE

It's hard to estimate distances in the Judean hills in and around Jerusalem, but I'm told that, as the crow flies, only three kilometres separates Jerusalem and Bethlehem – less than the distance from Bloor Street to Eglinton Avenue in Toronto. Yet, despite the proximity of these two holy burgs, the psycho-political gap between them can still be measured in lightyears.

Last year, while attending a millennium-related tourism industry function in a Bethlehem hotel, I tried to telephone a colleague who worked 10 minutes away in Jerusalem. Using a pay phone in the lobby, I dialed the number three times, each time receiving a tape message in Arabic.

Was I dialing incorrectly? As a North American used to invisible and near-perfect phone service, I just didn't get it. Then the front-desk clerk explained: Since the Israeli and Palestinian telephone authorities have no friendly patch service between them, an Israeli cell phone is the only way to make such a phone call. (I borrowed one and made the call.)

Despite the distance that usually divides Israelis and Palestinians, representatives of both peoples recently came together in Ottawa. The occasion was a travel industry breakfast sponsored by the Travel Media Association of Canada.

Both Abdul Bakr Munem, the Palestinian representative to Canada, and Arie Shevy Shibi, the Israeli consul for tourism in Canada, were in attendance. When they shook hands and pledged to work jointly on tourism initiatives, the room broke into a prolonged standing ovation of the sort heard infrequently on the White House lawn.

"We were once fighting, now we are friends," said Munem, adding that "Our region is ready to welcome thousands of Canadian tourists."

"Tourism is the passport to peace," said Shevy Shibi. "With the advent of peace, Canadian tourists to the Middle East will be able to experience so many more cultures and traditions."

The Pope's historic visit last month will also certainly serve to remove barriers and open doors. And while Prime Minister Jean Chretien's recent gaffe-ridden foray into Israel and the Middle East may not exactly inspire ovations, it was still precedent-setting: he is the first sitting Canadian prime minister to pay an official state visit to Israel. (I wonder what took so long?).

Perhaps the visit will encourage fence-sitting Canadians of every denomination to follow.

This week, Jordan's King Abdullah is expected to visit Israel to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak in Eilat. He has reportedly postponed going until now because of problems that have stalled both the Palestinian-Israeli and the Syrian-Israeli peace tracks.

If you seek a specific enticement to visit Israel, consider the following:

• Rosie Schwartz, a travel columnist for the Ottawa Citizen, is teaming up with Tony Aspler, wine columnist for the Toronto Star, to lead a gourmet tour to Israel. Their unique kitchen mission leaves Toronto May 14, seeking tastes of Israel in five-star restaurants, street markets, wineries and Druze villages before returning May 25. For details contact Linda at 416-481-3323.

• The 24th annual Jacob's Ladder Folk Festival occurs on the shore of the Sea of Galilee on May 19 and 20. See the Web site http://www.goisrael.com.

• Current exhibits at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem include The Yemenites: Two Thousand Years of Jewish Culture, and Cradle of Christianity, which explores the origins of Christianity through hundreds of finds uncovered in the land of Israel. Web site, http://www.imj.org.il.

Author's life on the run in wartime Poland

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

In Nazi-occupied Poland, 100 cigarettes and a bottle of vodka was the reward offered to citizens for turning in a Jew in hiding. It was just enough of an incentive to keep young Arthur Schaller on the run.

Sharing life-defining experiences that took nearly half a century to bring to print, 100 Cigarettes and a Bottle of Vodka: A Memoir (Malcolm Lester Books) chronicles the boyhood of Arthur Schaller from 1939 to 1945.

While it received critical acclaim last year, 100 Cigarettes was released after Schaller's death in the summer of 1998. He died just as the book was being published.

Chronicling his life from age 11 to 15, the book follows his prewar family life up to their time together in the Warsaw Ghetto. He describes his sense of loss when he separated from his parents and younger brother. Escaping to the Polish countryside at age 14, he lived as an orphaned Catholic cowherd.

For him, it was a life of great danger and uncertainty – but not of despair. Moving from farm to farm to avoid detection, Schaller never lost focus of the goal ahead of him: to survive for today to live for tomorrow.

Drawing on cunning and street- smart resourcefulness, Schaller recounts how he raised himself. But he always kept the lessons he learned from his parents and from Judaism close to heart.

He wrote of his personal philosophy: "Absolute good is here all the time, and lucky are the ones who can see it and rise above their misery. It could be said that I consciously thought about these things. I just knew deep inside, and knowing it was as normal to me as breathing."

Many of his detailed accounts tell much about Jewish Warsaw before and during the war. Stories of the family tie into holiday and Shabbat.

He recounts from afar the Jewish uprising in the Warsaw Ghetto in April to May of 1943. Falling at the time of Passover, Schaller asks himself questions about the purpose of that hopeless fight for freedom, questions for which he could not readily find answers.

During Schaller's travels, music helped him keep his sanity. Maintaining a connection to his mother, who was a pianist, he learned to play and teach others along the way, and that helped him win their favour.

Schaller, who immigrated to Canada immediately after World War II under the name Shaller, shared his love of music with the family he started here. His daughter Halina is a songwriter.

100 Cigarettes and a Bottle of Vodka, which remains in many ways a tribute to the memory of Schaller's lost family, is available at Chapters bookstore.

Film a testament to man's capacity for self-delusion

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In 1979, when he was filming Shoah, his epic about the Holocaust, Claude Lanzmann interviewed 63-year-old Maurice Rossel, a Swiss Red Cross official who had written a rather glowing report about his visit to the Thresienstadt concentration camp in June 1944.

Rossel inspected Theresienstadt – a camp for "prominent" Jews which funnelled its hapless inmates to death camps like Auschwitz and Treblinka – with the consent of the German authorities. Having expected the Red Cross delegation, led by Rossel, the Germans cynically gussied up Theresienstadt so that it would appear to be an innocuous "model ghetto."

Certainly, Rossel was fooled. "I saw a normal small town," he told the incredulous Lanzmann.

Since Shoah was already shaping up to be an inordinately long film, Lanzmann decided not to use the Rossel clip. But now he has released it as a free-standing documentary under the title of A Visitor From the Living. Taking the form of a conversation between Lanzmann and Rossel, it will be screened by Cinematheque on Sunday, April 30 at 2:45 p.m. at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall.

The 65-minute film, a deadpan testament to man's capacity for self-delusion, is well worth seeing.

Theresienstadt, 50 miles northeast of Prague, was emptied of its Czech inhabitants and filled with so-called "prominenten." They were assimilated Jews from all over Europe, but especially Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia, who had distinguished themselves as high officials, politicians, scientists or decorated war veterans.

Packed into overcrowded barracks, and beset by malnutrition, the largely elderly Jews of Theresienstadt were doomed, destined for trans-shipment to the gas chambers of Poland.

Before Theresienstadt, Rossel had visited Auschwitz, unannounced, in 1943. The surprised commandant, receiving him courteously and expressing his admiration of Switzerland, showed him nothing. Rossel saw no crematoriums, nor could he smell the stench of burning flesh. The few prisoners he passed resembled walking skeletons.

The commandant, however, alluded to the " incredible job" he and his subordinates were performing. Europe, he boasted, would "thank" Nazi Germany one day.

Rossel, the representative of the International Red Cross Committee in Germany, left Auschwitz empty-handed, realizing in his heart of hearts that it was "a terrible place," but still unaware of its real diabolical purpose.

Rossel's visit to Theresienstadt, which lasted about three hours, was carefully stage-managed to create a false impression. Rossel, unwittingly, legitimized Theresienstadt as a kind of Nazi Disney World.

In retrospect, he fully understands that he was taken for a fool and/or a naif. There was, he now concedes, a "tricked-up," manipulative atmosphere in the camp, which the Germans had artfully transformed into a "Potemkin ghetto" for the day.

The tour was conducted by a robotic Jewish doctor who was subsequently executed. The Jews in Rossel's line of vision, wearing yellow stars, were docile and passive. In fact, they were terrified.

Thinking that he had entered a camp for "privileged" Jews, Rossel was impressed by the immaculate facilities – the kindergartens, the parks, the cafes, the synagogue, the living quarters. He could not see beyond the falsified facade. Nor could he have known that 5,000 Jews had been dispatched to Auschwitz on the eve of his brief and unedifying visit.

Looking back at his useless visit, Rossel, his face a passive mask, admits that he was bamboozled by the Germans. "It's amazing that no one ever said, 'This is a farce,'" he observes, still amazed by the "play acting" of the Jews.

Smoking a cigarillo, he admits that he would not have written a rosy report about Theresienstadt had he been apprised of its actual function.

It is not exactly a startling admission. But as these words spill out of his mouth, his unblinking eyes reveal a flicker of apologetic emotion for the first time in the interview.

A 'painterly' novel

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Stoddart Publishers has produced a second edition of Toronto writer Cary Fagan's acclaimed miniature novel The Doctor's House in a new collection titled The Doctor's House and Other Fiction (softcover, $24.95).

The Doctor's House received glowing praise from the Globe and Mail and elsewhere when Fagan published it privately five years ago as the first imprint of his own small publishing house, paperplate books.

The story focuses on a gentile boy who is wounded in a pogrom in which his mother dies, and is taken to recuperate in a Jewish household in Warsaw in the 1930s.

When the book first appeared, the Globe reviewer called it a "painterly" novel that "radiates from its small canvas."

The opinion of this reviewer is that it is a minor yet largely unknown classic of Canadian Jewish writing.

"It's like most of his fiction – it's very condensed and every word carries the exact amount of freight," says Stoddart managing editor Don Bastion. "He's a minimalist in his approach. Even though he put it out himself in a very fine edition, we thought it deserved a wider readership."

Stoddart also published Fagan's last novel, Felix Roth, and according to Bastion, the Toronto-based publishing house hopes to publish his next one as well.

"He is, I think, one of the finest novelists writing in Canada, but he's so quiet about it that a lot of people don't realize how well his stuff is coming along," Bastion said. "[Bringing out a new edition of The Doctor's House] is our way of keeping him in the public eye."

The four stories included in the collection confirm Fagan's reputation as an impeccable stylist with a precise and masterly control over plot and language.

His previous novels include The Animals' Waltz and Sleeping Weather. His first published novel, The Animals' Waltz, features a female Jewish protagonist from the Toronto suburb of Bathurst Manor, and won praise from the New York Times Book Review after its publication in 1994.

JEWISH FILM FEST SALUTES ISRAELI FILMMAKERS

Spring, says the 20th-century bard, is the cruelest season, breeding lilacs out of the dead ground, generating possibility without hope.

But according to the traditional Jewish view, the Passover season is intensely and miraculously life-affirming, a time of freedom and spiritual renewal, a time of possibility and simultaneous hope.

As such, it's the perfect season for Toronto's annual Jewish Film Festival (TJFF), which has gained international prominence in only eight years.

From May 4 to May 11, the eighth annual TJFF screens 58 short and feature-length films from a pool of more than 200 films that were previewed. In his search for material, programming director Shlomo Schwartzberg went as far afield as the Berlin International Film Festival, from which he brought back three films.

Israeli films take centre stage this year, beginning with the opening-night-gala entry Yana's Friends (1999), a drama about Russian immigrants in Israel that recently snagged 10 Israeli "Academy" Awards.

Besides three documentaries, four features, five TV dramas and 10 shorts, the cinematic cornucopia from the Promised Land also includes live talent. Directors Eli Cohen and Renen Schorr, and the country's leading actor Moshe Ivgi. They will be attending and introducing films with which they are associated.

Schorr, who directed the now-famous Late Summer Blues (1987), is head of Israel's stellarly successful Sam Spiegel Film & Television School, to which the fest pays tribute by showcasing five shorts. "They are very, very accomplished films," notes Schwartzberg. "If these are the people who are going to be making films in Israel, then the Israeli cinema has a very bright future."

Perhaps not unexpectedly given the shape of the culture, Holocaust films also play an important role: included are four such works from Germany. The fest is resurrecting the original 1974 East German version of Jakob Der Luegner (Jacob The Liar), a predecessor of the recent eponymous feature starring Robin Williams.

The festival has also assembled what promises to be a provocative panel discussion – the topic is Enough Holocaust Films, Already! – featuring filmmakers Eli Cohen (Summer of Aviya), Elida Schogt (Zyklon Portrait), Christopher Riley (After the Truth), Jack Kuper (A Day in the Life of the Warsaw Ghetto – A Birthday Trip in Hell) and others.

This year also delivers more Canadian content than ever before, in the form of seven short films (six by Toronto filmmakers) and an enticing new feature, La Position de L'Escargot (The Snail Position) from Quebec. Toronto filmmaker David Kaufman's The New Klezmorim makes a world premiere here, as does the 44-minute German-made documentary, Violin Up! Isaac Stern in Cologne.

Another worthy piece making its Toronto debut is the Oscar-nominated Solomon and Gaenor, a "British-made, Welsh-set, Romeo-and-Juliet-type love story," Schwartzberg says, that is subtitled whenever the speech ventures from English into either Yiddish or Welsh.

Admirably, the fest looks backward into the rearview mirror as it moves ahead. Besides the already-mentioned Late Summer Blues and Jakob The Liar, it is screening dusty classics such as Paul Mazursky's 1976 drama Next Stop Greenwich Village and the far more obscure Yiddish musical fantasy-comedy Der Yidishe Nigun (The Jewish Melody), directed by Josef Seiden in the United States in 1940.

"We have a rare private print – a collector in New York loaned it to the Festival," Schwartzberg says.

Oh, and did I mention From Swastika to Jim Crow? This new U.S.-made video documentary looks at the high number of European Jewish professors, fired by the Nazis, who ended up teaching at African American colleges in the United States.

And what about The Port of Last Resort, which tells the fascinating story of the 20,000 Jews who escaped Hitler by going east to Shanghai? Happily, the festival's stunning array of cinematic riches cannot adequately be summed up in one column.

For tickets or a program, call the TJFF box office at 416-324-9121 or visit the Web site at www.tjff.com. The box office is located at 33 Prince Arthur Ave., second floor. On opening day (Thursday May 4), the box office moves to the festival site at the Hyland Cinemas (Yonge St. north of St. Clair) where it remains until closing day, May 11.

David Kaufman's The New Klezmorim debuts at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Jewish Film Festival appeals to movie-goers of all tastes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The eighth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival will be launched on Thursday, May 4. This year's version is bigger than ever, with 19 features, five made-for-TV dramas, 11 documentaries and 23 shorts scheduled to be screened.

The one-week festival appeals to all tastes, judging from a sampling of five films from Britain, Argentina, Israel, Germany and the United States.

Solomon & Gaenor, one of this year's Oscar nominees for best foreign movie, is a tragic love story which unfolds in English, Welsh and Yiddish in a Welsh mining village at the turn of the last century. Paul Morrison's sparkling gem is due to open at the Cineplex Odeon chain on May 19.

It's basically a cautionary tale of forbidden romance, pitting a love-struck couple against their families and their respective cultures and religions.

Solomon (Ioan Gruffudd), a Jewish cotton-goods door-to-door salesman from an adjacent valley, falls hard for Gaenor (Nia Roberts), a demure woman from a relatively poor and religious Welsh mining family. Afraid of offending Gaenor, Solomon passes himself off as Sam, an Englishman.

Courting her ardently, Solomon presents Gaenor with a beautifully fitted red dress and establishes a friendship with her. But the odds against it blooming into a full-blown relationship are practically nil. Jews are considered strangers, and grassroots anti-Semitism is common.

As for Solomon's Orthodox parents, they impress upon him that Jews are different and should keep to themselves.

Despite these very real obstacles, Solomon and Gaenor are inexorably draw to each other, and inevitably, Gaenor becomes pregnant. Excommunicated by her church, she feels the shame and wrath of her family. Amid a bitter miners' strike with anti-Jewish overtones, she breaks away from Solomon. Can they reunite?

Sensitively directed by Morrison, Solomon & Gaenor is a quiet though forceful film with first-rate performances by a stellar cast. The script, as written by Morrison, captures the boundless joy and the heartbreak of these young lovers as they courageously defy intolerant conventions. The deft camera work distills the gritty realism of the isolated Welsh valleys. In essence, Solomon & Gaenor is a finely wrought study in cultural dissonance.

Eduardo Mignogna's Autumn Sun, a droll drama from Argentina, resembles Solomon & Gaenor superficially. Clara Goldstein (the compelling Norma Aleandro), a love-lorn, middle- aged Jewish accountant who lives in Buenos Aires, places a personal ad in a newspaper in the hope of snagging an ideal companion. Raoul Ferrara, alias Saul Levin, a suave, silver-haired lothario, floats into her lonely life one fine day.

Trouble is, Saul/Raoul is not Jewish, though at first he pretends to be. Clara unmasks his ruse when he cannot pronounce the word "verenikas" correctly.

Disappointed by his methods, Clara drops him. But before too long, Raoul (Fredrico Luppi), a picture framer who learned the trade from a Jewish friend, is back on the scene. In an attempt to educate him in the ways of Jewish culture, Clara tries to teach him Yiddish. She also takes him to a synagogue, a Jewish cemetery and a kosher restaurant. Raoul is not a fast learner, yet Clara grows to love him. In the meantime, she fends off the entreaties of a rather unattractive Jewish merchant named Bernardo Cohen.

Since the theme of Autumn Sun is life's unexpected turns, no one will be surprised when passions suddenly erupt. In a moment of clarity, Clara abandons all inhibitions and doubts and invites Raoul into her bedroom. What follows is a rare but luminous example of older lovers on the screen. It's quite lovely and affecting, like the movie itself.

David Rubinger is a collector of collective memories, having photographed some of Israel's most evocative moments. In a long and illustrious career, he has snapped an album-full of memorable pictures, but the ones that will probably stand the test of time deal with war and peace.

His photograph of three haggard Israeli soldiers looking up at the Western Wall is synonymous with the Six Day War. His composition of Anwar al-Sadat descending from his airplane upon arrival in Jerusalem on his first historic visit to Israel distills the nuances of a great event.

In Eyewitness: David Rubinger, Photographer, a crisp documentary by Micha Shagrir, Rubinger revisits the people and scenes of some of his most famous photographs. Since Rubinger is a gregarious person, the "reunions" with his subjects of old are well worth the journey.

From Swastika To Jim Crow, by Lori Cheatle and Martin Toub, tells the little-known but fascinating story of Jewish scholars from Nazi Germany who resumed their academic careers at small black colleges in the American south.

Usually spurned by anti-Semitic white universities, refugees like John Herz, Ernst Manasse, Lore Rasmussen, Viktor Lowenfeld and Fritz Pappenheim found employment at all-black institutions such as Howard College, Talledega College, Hampton Institute and the University of Virginia. Being extraordinarily sensitive to racial terror, they blended perfectly into their respective environments, and their contributions were universally appreciated.

The refugees had no idea what awaited them in these provincial Southern towns, where racial discrimination, segregation and xenophobia were the norm, and where Jews were invariably considered as outsiders. Manasse was threatened by his neighbours because he had invited a black colleague to his home, while Rasmussen was arrested for frequenting a black restaurant. Yet, these were merely bumps along a road which brought them professional satisfaction and the respect of their peers.

In 1944, the German government released The Fuhrer Gives a City to the Jews, a cruelly crude film which glorified conditions in the Theresienstadt concentration camp, a way station to Auschwitz for most of its hapless inmates. This grotesque propaganda film, animated by a soothing musical score, portrays its inhabitants as happy campers who revel in a bucolic milieu. Seniors play chess and write letters. Blacksmiths, tailors and cobblers attend to their work. Children play happily in a park. Smiling women tend to lush gardens. Doctors perform surgery in immaculate facilities. Cheering crowds attend a soccer game. What, one may ask, happened to all these poor people?

Softball team holding tryouts

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The boys of summer are back at it – that is, the boys of summer 2001 are back at it – getting ready to defend their softball gold medal at next year's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Head coach Brian Revin is gearing up for a hat trick as the team's manager, looking to lead Canada to a third consecutive gold medal. The first step on the long journey to Israel begins in Montreal on St. Jean Baptiste Day, June 25, when a group of softball hopefuls will try out for the team. A week later, the best of the bunch will travel to Toronto and meet candidates from the rest of the country for a two-day evaluation camp, which will likely be held at Wilmington Park.

Competition for positions is wide open with none of last tournament's holdovers guaranteed a spot, Revin said. Although he expects most of the 1997 team to try out, some key members of the team have retired, leaving at least three spots wide open.

Pitcher Mark Bendahan, a mainstay of Maccabiah teams since 1985, has left to coach the junior Maccabiah team, while there are also openings at first and second base as well as the outfield, Revin said.

"If they are a reasonable player, they should come out and try out for the team," he said.

The Maccabiah baseball brain trust has got its eye on some 19-year-old players who play in the Waterloo Junior League, but even they must play their way onto the team.

"There's nobody who's clinched a spot at this particular time," Revin said.

Pure baseball skill is not the only criterion that goes into determining who makes the team and who gets cut. "I have left better players behind and chosen players based on their desire to play and their ability to get along well with others. That's important when you go away for three weeks," the coach added.

For more information, contact Revin at 905-764-0268 or Sam Wetston at 416-780-1019.

Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

A Blessing in Disguise

Based on a story told by Peninnah Schram

The couple was celebrating their third Passover together. Though not selfish people, they were not overly generous with their time or their possessions. They were proud of their spotless house and all the furnishings they had worked hard to acquire.

The Passover seder had begun, with just the two of them, when they came to the passage in the Haggadah that states: "Let all who are hungry come in and eat…"

A sudden banging at their door startled them. An old man, his beard streaked with white and gray, his clothes more torn than whole, was standing in their threshold.

"I am looking for a place for the Passover seder," he stated bluntly. Peering over their shoulders, he saw the table set, with the seder plate at the end and the cup of Elijah in the middle. "It looks like I've found the right place."

The couple looked at each other. The old man edged his way through the door, and the couple moved aside. After all, he had arrived exactly during the recitation of the passage inviting all strangers into their home, they thought.

Moments later, they regretted their decision. The surprise visitor was the worst guest they had ever entertained. Most of the soup he was served ended up on his clothing rather than in his mouth. He recited the Haggadah in an incomprehensible manner, spilled the wine all over their expensive white table cloth, and turned the pages of the Haggadah with such force, that he ripped more than a few of them right out of the book.

The couple were only too overjoyed when the old man left. Yet even this moment disturbed the couple.

"I will leave you with a blessing. May every future Passover you share be as joyous as this one," said the old man on his way out.

The couple looked at each other in horror. This was not a blessing, but a curse! they thought.

A few weeks after Passover passed, the couple received a second shock. The wife was pregnant and had been so for a few months. The couple, of course, was planning on having children, but not just yet. They had certain financial goals they hoped to reach before starting a family.

But when their baby daughter was born, the couple forgot all about their earlier misgivings. The joy of bringing a new life into the world, the boundless love they felt towards their infant, and the endless delight they took in even the smallest gesture of their child, made all other considerations vanish.

The next Passover was far different. This time the couple had friends over for the seder, toys lay everywhere, and the furniture was looking a bit ragged.

And at the seder table, when their child babbled on incoherently or spilled the wine on the table or ripped the pages of the Haggadah with uncontrolled zeal, to the surprise of their friends, the couple just laughed it off as their little "genius" at work.

Suddenly, there was a knock on the door. Before they could even rise, the old man stood in front of them. And, precisely at the same moment, they realized that his parting words were truly "a blessing in disguise."

CABBAGE BORSCHT

olive oil	juice of 1 large lemon	1/3 cup tomato ketchup
1 lb flanken	1 beef bouillon cube	1 small cabbage, shredded
2 medium onions, chopped	1 1/2 cups canned plum tomatoes	2 tblsp granulated sugar
3 stalks celery	2 cups tomato juice	3 cups stock or broth
2 carrots, chopped	2 to 3 tblsp tomato paste	white pepper

In a large, heavy saucepan, brown ribs in hot oil. Remove, then add onions, carrots and celery. Cook until tender. Return ribs to saucepan, add undrained tomatoes, tomato juice, tomato paste, lemon juice, ketchup and beef bouillon cube. Bring to boil, then stir in cabbage (about 8 cups), sugar and 3 cups beef stock or broth. Season with pepper.

Cover and simmer gently over low heat 30 mins. then remove short ribs, take meat from bone and slice into bite-sized pieces. Continue simmering soup for 15 mins. with meat from short ribs. Add additional stock if needed. Check seasoning before serving. Makes about 12 cups.

About Life

Dear Ella,

During Passover, I did something I am very embarrassed about.

A friend of mine saw me as I was walking out of a McDonalds Restaurant and we were both very uncomfortable. I was with some friends from work who aren't Jewish and I was too embarrassed to rock the boat by saying I couldn't eat there, so I just went along with it.

I could kick myself for being so weak. Not only did I decide to eat chametz on Passover, I also made sure it was as treif as treif could be.

The person who saw me is my neighbour and now we keep avoiding eye contact when we come out of our homes. It's one of those scenes where we pretend we didn't really see each other.

How am I ever going to get out of this one?

Couldn't Passover

Dear Couldn't Passover

What's done is done, and there is no use kicking yourself over and over for it. Life goes on. As humans, we have the ability to make choices. They are not always the right ones, but most often, we learn from our mistakes.

Your friendship, however, needs some mending. There were obvious misconceptions on your friend's part as to your observance of Passover and she was shocked to see you coming out of McDonalds. Give her a few days to come to grips with the idea of you not being as observant as she had thought – and then talk.

This incident must come out into the open if you are ever going to get back to where you were in the friendship department.

Let her know how you feel about what happened, and then put this whole thing behind you.

God willing you will have many more opportunities to do many mitzvot in your life.

VIGIL FOR THE THIRTEEN: A rally, organized by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario Region and UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, was held Sunday at Earl Bales Park in Toronto on behalf of the 13 Iranian Jews whose trial on charges of espionage recommenced behind closed doors. Rabbi Amram Assayag, Chief Rabbi, Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario addressed nearly 300 people. Thirteen members of Young Judea each held a sign on which was written the name of an accused. See story on page 32. [Ron Csillag photos]

Recalling her trial

By DEBORAH E. LIPSTADT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

In 1995, when I opened a letter informing me that David Irving was suing me for libel for calling him a Holocaust denier, I had precisely the same reaction that I had 20 years earlier when I first heard that there were people who denied the Holocaust. I laughed.

Why, I wondered, take this seriously? Holocaust deniers reminded me of flat-earth theorists. The idea was preposterous.

Irving's charges seemed equally preposterous. He had repeatedly denied the Holocaust. At the trial of Ernst Zundel, in Toronto, he said there was no "Reich policy to kill the Jews" and "no documents whatsoever show that a Holocaust had ever happened."

In Germany, Irving declared the Holocaust a "blood lie [which] has been pronounced on the German people." In 1991, he dropped mention of the Holocaust from his new edition of Hitler's biography because "if something didn't happen then you don't even dignify it with a footnote."

That same year he declared it his goal to "sink the Battleship Auschwitz."

Given this record how could he claim that I libelled him by calling him a denier? This was, I presumed, a nuisance lawsuit, full of sound and fury but signifying nothing.

A couple of lawyers' letters, I naively assumed, and all would be resolved. But Irving was doing this in England where the laws favour the plaintiff. I had to prove the truth of what I said. He did not have to prove the falsehood.

Irving talks not only about what has been done to Jews, but what will be done to them.

Stanley Cup coach going to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Dallas Stars may be in the middle of the NHL playoffs right now, but it's a trip to Israel this summer that's got head coach Ken Hitchcock really excited. Well, a chance at a second Stanley Cup may still be his number one concern, but a summertime trip to Israel would be a perfect way to end a hectic season and playoff run.

In August, Hitchcock will team up with the coaching staff of the Roger Neilson Hockey Camp for a week of hockey instruction at the Canada Centre skating rink in Metulla. Joining him on the ice will be his two step-sons, Noah and Alex, while his wife, Nancy Bruce, who is Jewish, and their daughter Emily will also make the trip.

Ken Hitchcock

This will be the first-ever visit to the Holy Land for the Hitchcocks. The boys, in particular, are excited about the trip, with the two of them "hammering away on the Internet" doing research about the country, Hitchcock said.

Even in the NHL coaching and playing ranks, Israel and the Metulla hockey school are becoming more widely known. Hitchcock learned of the camp from Neilson two years ago.

"I talked to Roger about it and he said what a great experience it was," Hitchcock said. "It was always in the back of my mind."

About two months ago he contacted Marshall Starkman, one of the co-founders of the camp, and volunteered his services.
